NEW DISCHARGE COMPLICATES PITTSBORO'S WATER WOES

Water samples suggest additional 1,4-Dioxane contamination from unknown Greensboro source

PITTSBORO — A second round of Pittsboro water analysis released Monday suggests another “slug” of 1,4-Dioxane was illegally released into the Haw River a week after Greensboro representatives announced a substantial onetime discharge from a still-unknown source. On July 1, the City of Greensboro and the North Carolina Dept. of Environmental Quality reported a discharge of 1,4-Dioxane into South Buffalo

Creek — a Haw River tributary — in effluent from Greensboro’s TZ Osborne Wastewater Treatment Plant. The chemical is a suspected carcinogen derived from industrial runoff. Preliminary samples in Greensboro indicated levels between 543 parts per billion and 687 parts per billion of 1,4-Dioxane in the water there. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency recommends no more than 35 ppb in healthy drinking water. After learning of the pollution, Pittsboro staff began testing the town’s water supply, Pittsboro Water Plant Superintendent Adam Pickett told the News

Revolutionizing the energy industry

The world's next big technology might be burgeoning in Chatham County

Alex West, vice president of operations and financial officer at 3DFS, expects the company's product might impact most people worldwide within about the next 10 years.

PITTSBORO — Energy is an imprecise science. Experts generally agree about two-thirds of all electrical energy goes to waste — from the generation point at a power plant, through a series of transformations, and finally at the outlet in your house, energy is sacrificed hither and thither with wanton abandon. “All that’s considered ‘rejected energy,’” Alex West, vice president of operations and financial officer at Pittsboro’s 3DFS, told the News + Record. “Only about 33% of the energy that is produced electrically is actually used and the rest is lost mostly through heat and through vibration.” 3DFS hopes to change that. The small Pittsboro startup — which has operated for about 10 years, the last seven in a 10,000 square-foot lab on N.C. Hwy. 902 — intends to upend the energy industry’s notion of acceptable waste. Its technology, software-defined electricity, has demon-

Scaled down plans for Moncure's Hindu temple under way

BY HANNAH MCCLELLAN
News + Record Staff

Plans to build a Hindu temple in Moncure are still under way, Carolina Murugan Temple organizers say, though construction will be scaled down and divided into multiple phases. Initial plans for the temple were presented to Chatham County in December 2018. By March 2019, temple organizers had purchased more than 130 acres for the facility, the News + Record reported, which would include a 155-foot statue of Murugan, the Hindu god of war whose purpose is to protect people from destructive forces. Now, “due to the nature of the project and cost,” those plans changed, said Kaali Dass, chairperson of Carolina Murugan Temple. The Phase 1 construction plans include a 2,500 square foot “temporary temple,” multi-acre ECO garden, walking trail to the riverfront and a 6-foot Murugan statue — and according to its website, will cost $7 million. “We submitted the Phase I scope for approval with Chatham county,” Dass said in an email to the News + Record. “We are waiting for the Phase I approval process with Chatham (C)ounty. At this point, we do not have any new updates to share. We will have more information by the end of September

Checking in with Pittsboro's new planning director

Theresa Thompson takes the helm

BY D. LARS DOLDER

PITTSBORO — Few town employees liaise with residents as often as the planning director. A municipality’s planning department administrators all zoning and subdivision regulations for property within the town’s jurisdiction. It facilitates and processes all requests for building permits and zoning changes — hefty responsibilities when, like Pittsboro, there’s meteoric growth taking place. New Planning Director Theresa Thompson, then, has assumed a weighty role. Thompson, who has served as Pittsboro’s interim planning director since former planner Jeff Jones left about six months ago, was officially awarded the permanent position last month. “We’re excited to remove her interim tag,” Town Manager Chris Kennedy said in a recent town board of commissioners meeting. “She’s worked really hard for us over the last few months and so we’re excited to have her in that capacity.” Thompson has been a regular fixture in Pittsboro’s board of commissioner meetings, where she presents the opportunity to refinance portions of existing debt obligations of the county. This will depend on the favorability of the market at the time of the county’s bond offering,” Thompson said. “Numerous factors will be considered to calculate and determine the efficacy of refinancing existing county debt. Refinancing existing debt could lower the cost of that debt, which would further improve the county’s financial position and increase the county’s debt capacity.” The bond issuance was approved at the board’s June 21 meeting. Both projects — the CCS Central Services building and county Emergency Operations Center — fall under the county’s capital projects. The county updates its 7-year Capital Improvement Program (CIP) every year, which includes capital expenditures more than $100,000. The implementation of the CIP is funded through two primary sources, Thompson said — the county’s debt reserve and its Capital Reserve accounts. Smaller capital projects that do not require debt are typically funded by the Capital Reserve, he said, while larger capital projects that require debt are funded through the county’s Debt Reserve. The two projects to be financed by the LOB approved at the

The county's 250th birthday party is ongoing. Here's what's still on the calendar.

The official kickoff of the Chatham 250 celebration — Founder's Day, which occurred back on April 10 — is in the rear view mirror. But there's plenty left on the official birthday party calendar. For more details, go to www.chatham250.com, but in the meantime, here's a rundown:

- Ongoing
- The Chatham 250 Passport program and the time capsule program (see main story) are ongoing through the fall of this year.
- Agricultural Photo Contest
- The Agricultural Photo Contest is accepting photo submissions until Sunday, Aug. 1st. "We are seeking photos that highlight agriculture in Chatham County, including agricultural landscapes, crops, livestock, farm activities like planting and harvesting, farm equipment, farm workers and farmers' markets," says lead organizer Hilary Pollan. "Agricultural enterprises could include produce, flowers, livestock, field crops, beekeeping, forestry and anything else related to agriculture." Photos can be submitted on the Chatham 250 website. Winners will receive a canvas print of their photo, and winning photos will be published in the News + Record and in Chatham Magazine and displayed at the Chatham County Agricultural Fair in September.

- Sidewalk Chalk Festival
- The Sidewalk Chalk Festival is set for the morning of Saturday, Sept. 11th, at The Park at Briar Chapel. The Chatham 250 committee is inviting artists of all skill-levels and ages to draw their own masterpiece inspired by Chatham County.
 - "All of Chatham County is invited to come spend the morning celebrating art by viewing the sidewalk chalk drawings and hopefully visiting a pop-up art market featuring Chatham County artists," Pollan said. Interested participants can RSVP on the Chatham 250 website.

- Parade/Caravana in Siler City
- The Chatham 250 celebration will be coming to a cheerful close with the Parade/Caravana taking place on Saturday, Oct. 23rd, in Siler City. Chatham 250 welcomes all community members, business and organizations to either participate in or watch the parade in celebration of Chatham County.

- 'LEARN' tab on the Chatham 250 website (coming soon)
- The Church and Communities Project is an opportunity to look back at where the many communities in Chatham County have come from and learn about the stories that assure us that we can get to where we should be, from here. Browse the collection of more than 20 Chatham County church histories, including wonderful songs, photos, artworks and histories.
 - Chatham County is and has been the home to a vibrant and diverse creative arts scene for many years. The Chatham County Artist Profiles highlight a series of past, current and emerging artists from a diverse range of creative disciplines, backgrounds and experiences.
 - Through oral histories and archival photos, the Jordan Lake Project tells the story of the people and communities that once existed where Jordan Lake now rests, and how the Lake became the destination it is today.

- Plant a Tree project
- Chatham 250 is excited to be partnering with Century Farm Orchards to offer a special Chatham 250 bundle of heirloom old southern Apple Trees. Each bundle will include one Aunt Rachel tree — a rare local variety of apple tree that originated in Chatham County and is deeply tied to the legacy of heirloom old southern apple trees expert and late Chatham County resident Lee Calhoun — as well as one heirloom old southern pollinator apple tree of the purchaser's choice. Orders can be placed on the Chatham 250 website though Sept. 10.

- For more information
- Chatham was named in 1758 after William Pitt, the 1st Earl of Chatham, who served as British Prime Minister from 1766 to 1768 and opposed the harsh policies established by colonial rule. The county was officially formed from a portion of Orange County in 1771.

the events and activities, specifically the Chatham 250 Passport Experience, that Chatham County residents engage in conversations and experiences that link us together in new and different ways, to build an understanding that our differences are what actually makes our character unique and strong," Pollan said.

That notion was perfectly reflected in the winning design chosen for the Chatham 250 logo earlier this year — a postage stamp-like creation by Pittsboro artist Sally Gregoire reflecting the idea that "communication links a community."

"The Chatham 250 core planning committee saw our aspirations for the anniversary celebrations deeply reflected in her description of this image," said Pollan, the community partners analyst for Chatham County who's coordinating the efforts to observe the event. "Also, put simply, we hope people have fun! This is a celebration, after all."

Much of the celebration focus right now is on what organizers are calling the "Chatham 250 Passport Experience," an ongoing program designed to lead participants into a deeper knowledge and experience of everything Chatham County has to offer, as well as a chance to experience first-hand new and different things.

Pollan said about 350 people have registered to take part, with more being added to the list every day. Participants register on the Chatham 250 website (or get a physical "passport" at the Pittsboro Welcome Center or at a county library branch) and check off passport "activities" — there's a complete calendar of them online, plus a QR code for easy smartphone access — on an honor system as they complete them.

Those who complete at least 10 of the activities from one of the five themed passports earn a Chatham 250 "swag bag" of local products and gift certificates. The bag will include coupons for free or discounted items and lots of unique "giveaways" valued at $5 or $10 or more. (The News + Record, a participant in the passport program, is providing a bag of Chatham Brew coffee, for example, to the swag bag.)

Campers gathered at the Great Chatham County Camp Out at Jordan Lake on June 26, one of the featured events on the Chatham 250 Passport program.

Registered participants are invited to post about their involvement using the hashtag "#chatham250" on social. They also received a monthly passport experience newsletter, as well as instructions about how to submit their completed passports to earn the swag bags.

A few dozen posts from participants have been made on Instagram so far. The qualifying activities on the passport include such things as visiting the Chatham County Historical Museum, attending a county commissioner or town board meeting, reading a George Moses Horton poem, visiting a local pottery studio, trying a specialty beverage at any Chatham County establishment, cooking a recipe using local ingredients or visiting a local park.

Pollan said anniversary-themed events have provided numerous highlights for participants because of the variety and scope of the activities and opportunities planned along the way.

She cites two that have been particularly relevant for her.

"The first was listening to people's generous wishes for Chatham County on its 250th birthday as they handed us their decorated rocks for the '250 Foundations' Community Art Project during Founding Day," she said. "Their wishes offered such a rich view of people's current connection to and future dreams for Chatham County."

Those decorated rocks are now on display in front of the Chatham Community Library at Central Carolina Community College's campus.

The second highlight, she said, was watching the sunset over Jordan Lake at the Great Chatham County Camp Out, held last month, while local musician Eric Sommer played campfire music for all the campers. Pollan described the experience as a "truly magical moment, watching the natural beauty of Chatham County in all its glory."

There's still a lot planned for the official observance of Chatham's semiquincentennial, including three of its main events — highlighted by a parade scheduled for Oct. 23 in Siler City (see sidebar story, page A3).

Meanwhile, organizers are building the "LEARN" section of the Chatham 250 website and soliciting items for a time capsule to be opened in 2071, Chatham's 300th year.

"So far, we've received some great items, including a Grand Trees of Chatham Calendar, a piece of artwork from the Chatham Arts Council's Clydefest, a Chatham County Public Health Department COVID-19 Vaccine Flyer, and Mountaire Farms toy chicken," Pollan said. "At Pittsboro Summer Fest, we had people write postcards to Chatham County residents in 2071, which will be included in the Time Capsule."

Pollan encourages the curious to visit the Chatham 250 website — www.chatham250.com — to check out historical research and to get information about ways to engage with and learn about Chatham 250, including upcoming events and activities, historical research, other projects and to sign up for the newsletter.

"Another great way to stay in the loop about Chatham 250 is to register for our monthly newsletter," she said. "Each month we send out a newsletter that includes two or three happenings in each of our five celebration areas and some general updates for the celebration."

Pollan said Chatham County social media channels highlight upcoming passport events each week, and that the website will be updated with photos and videos from past events.

strated the ability to radically improve energy transmission and retention. According to data on its website, 3DFS can demonstrate 94% efficiency, "meaning that the electrical energy remained electricity and fully transferred the energy into work..."

After a decade developing and refining their invention, 3DFS's scientists and engineers are ready to share it with the world. If the company's ambitions come to fruition, 3DFS will change electricity as we know it. As Apple and Microsoft revolutionized communication, as the Wright brothers and Ford revolutionized transportation, 3DFS is poised to revolutionize energy.

"Not everyone is our client yet, but everyone's our end user," West said. "Electricity is the largest interconnected machine that humankind has ever produced. This is an oversimplification, but it's essentially one wire that connects all of us. We have this enormous machine that's living, it's breathing, and the goal is to be able to connect our technology on the end user side, on the generation side, on the transmission side, so that everything is working in tandem to create a cleaner grid to create a more efficient power system."

If all goes according to plan, 3DFS's technology will "touch a vast majority of the people on this planet," West said. The biggest hurdle, though, is explaining to prospective customers how software-defined electricity actually works. The concept is yet obscure and it's exceedingly complicated. Even new employees need about four months of dedicated training before they're prepared to contribute anything useful, West said.

The process (uber simplified) works in two stages. First, and perhaps most impressive, 3DFS' software performs hyper-specific, real-time analysis of electricity in action. It extracts millions of data points from an electrical transmission in fractions of a second to build a model of exactly what's happening and where energy is being wasted.

Second, having interpreted the data acquired in step one, the software uses an intricate series of algorithms to predict future inefficiency and preemptively correct the signal, synchronizing the electrical waves and virtually eliminating energy loss. The company's name, 3DFS, refers to part of this process, but a more detailed explanation is "actually a secret," West said. "It's a part of what makes our technology work, but I'll have to keep you guessing on that one."

If that layman's explanation is still hard to understand, don't feel bad, West says. Convincing prospective clients that its technology is not science-fiction fantasy is one of 3DFS' biggest challenges.

"It's just so different, a completely different approach to how we tackle the energy problem," West said. "A lot of people, and rightly so, are concerned with the production on the other side, like natural gas and petroleum, wind, hydro — the sources of energy. And that's great, we need that concern. But a much smaller amount of people are concerned about once we get it to create electricity, what happens now?"

But 3DFS is starting to make waves. In the last few years, the company has been widely recognized for its contributions to technology, and big energy users (think the defense industry and Big Data, for example) are rearing to employ its product. In 2017, 3DFS won one of Popular Mechanics' coveted Breakthrough awards. Last year, it was recognized by the United Kingdom's Ministry of Defence in the department's annual sustainability publication. And the company has featured in such publications as Forbes and Vox.

Newfound interest has bolstered the company's bottom line, and 3DFS is looking to make aggressive expansion. The 15-person staff was only five a year ago, and hopes to reach 35 by the end of 2021. By the end of 2022, West expects the company will have hit 100 employees and moved to a bigger facility, perhaps at one of Chatham's budding megasites. With a reinforced team, 3DFS anticipates average electricity users will feel the benefits of software-define electricity within the next decade.

"We want to integrate across the residential level and be able to put a device to help measure and correct power in real time for homeowners and apartment complexes, that kind of thing," West said. "That's probably a 10-year timeline to get to there, though."

Besides saving billions of dollars, which are forfeited now to cover unused energy production, 3DFS's technology will reduce carbon emissions, helping address the global climate crisis. And the company's leaders are especially proud to bring high-paying, important jobs to rural N.C.

"North Carolinians are brilliant people, and they're not all in Charlotte or Raleigh," West said. "We kind of hope to be an industry that can provide really nice jobs outside of those metro areas. I live in Chatham County. Most of our staff lives in Chatham County. But it is increasingly difficult to find good jobs in rural areas. So we hope to give people another option outside the heavy population areas, and I think it's exciting what we'll be doing here in years to come."

How about turning the nozzle down on all that high-pressure salesmanship?

We're kicking around the idea of replacing the shower in a bathroom at our house. In the process, as we've talked to a few companies specializing in that kind of refurbishment work, I've been reminded of the loathsomeness — and ineffectiveness — of high-pressure salespeople.

You know them, right? I've developed great friendships with a number of salesmen and saleswomen over the years, but I've also sat across the table from an odious lot of well-meaning pitchers of products and ideas, people who turn incredulous when you don't immediately and enthusiastically bite at their dangled hook. Show the slightest bit of hesitation or skepticism — or worse, interest — and they try to steamroll you into a "yes," usually with a tinge of a "you can't logically say 'no,' can you?" angle.

Last week, my wife got a turn on that ride.

Lee Ann, my bride of 31 years, is a tough cookie. She's not been within the same ZIP code as rude or arrogant or mean, but in her own velvet-handed way she's way more likely than I to send a bad meal back to the kitchen at a restaurant or point out a minor flaw in a service or product we're paying for.

Me? On the phone, like with a telemarketer, I can play the strong-armed guy who occasionally likes to prank a caller. Recently, for example, I strung along one of those car-warranty salespeople for a few fun minutes by claiming to have a 1984 Cutlass Cierra with only 12 miles on it in the garage of my (equally-fictitious) vacation home in Cuba; yes, I said, I was very much interested in buying an extended warranty for the car. But they also had to warranty its 8-track tape player and find me a pristine copy of "Synchronicity," the stellar tape by the band The Police, which had melted in the stifling Caribbean summer.

In person, though, I'm more docile, usually deciding only after the damage is done that I should have spoken up about something unsatisfactory.

So back to Lee Ann: late one recent afternoon, she got exposed to a litany of sales closing techniques that were as irritatingly abrasive as anything I'd heard before. After all the measurements in the bathroom were done, the tile and glass were picked out and the estimate was calculated and presented, the salesman went in for the kill. He twisted the nozzle to wide open and began figuratively spraying Lee Ann with a barrage of tactics, superlatives, "today only" incentives, rationalities and arm-twisting.

As she sat at the kitchen table with the sales guy and I sat in the living room working, I couldn't believe what I was hearing — but it was enough to know that he wasn't listening when she said we were getting more estimates before making a decision. I also could tell by Lee Ann's voice that she'd had enough. Lee Ann can fight her own battles, so in getting out of my chair I was as much coming to his rescue as I was hers.

"Listen," I said to him, nicely, as I stood up and walked to the table. "Here's what she's trying to tell you: we're not deciding today. We're getting three quotes, and you're just the first."

"So you don't care about quality?" he asked. "Doesn't that mean something to you?"

"Look," I said. "I get that you're trained to sell a certain way. I understand closing the deal. I know you're trying to make a sale, but we're just not there yet. We've done projects like this before. A lot. We're going to talk to the other two vendors before we make a decision."

That did little to deter him. He kept up his patter, working a new wrinkle. Soon, we were talking over each other. And not long after that we were showing him the door.

The worst part? A bystander in this scene was a new employee of the company who'd just joined as a salesperson; he was sitting in on our presentation as part of his training. This gentleman — twice the age of the "pro" he was training under, meaning he was older than Lee Ann and I were — had arrived at the appointment on time. We'd had such a pleasant conversation with him, learning about his career in construction and contracting, that we barely noticed that when the "pro" finally arrived, he was a full 30 minutes late.

As the young gun drove off in a huff, the sales trainee stood apologetically on our front porch. Earlier in our conversation he'd said one of the things he liked most about his new company was that they didn't use high-pressure sales tactics. Now he was embarrassed. And maybe having second thoughts.

He left sheepishly, leaving in the air the one thing his associate should have said a half hour earlier — in fact, the best closing line I've ever heard: "What can we do to earn your business?"

After which comes the secret to sales: shut up and listen.

Healthcare and hubris

My wife and I were both raised in North Carolina. After more than a decade out of state, we were delighted to become Tar Heels again in 2018. Our home state stands out in our minds as the best place to live in the country.

However, I advocate for our state to become more like the majority of our nation on a critical issue. North Carolina is one of only 12 states that has declined expansion of Medicaid health insurance.

There is no legitimate fiscal argument to justify this inaction. In the past 12 years, Medicaid expansion has actually resulted in net savings for those other state budgets. States which have expanded coverage have also seen decreases in rural hospital closures and lower health insurance premiums. According to a study by the Center for Health Policy Research at George Washington University, Medicaid expansion would create 37,000 new jobs across the state!

No wonder a recent poll conducted by Care4Carolina — a non-partisan coalition dedicated to strengthening the economic and social well-being of all residents in the Tar Heel State — found that 77% of North Carolinians supported expanding Medicaid for all citizens earning at or below 138% of the federal poverty level. Supporters include Republicans and Democrats, social progressives and fiscal conservatives, rural and urban residents and people of different faiths and philosophies.

Why, then, did the N.C. Senate fail to include the expansion of coverage as part of this year's proposed budget?

If there are neither fiscal nor rational arguments, then our elected officials must have based their decision on ideological concerns that are contrary to the common good of our state's citizens. This failure of leadership is an old story.

Two thousand years ago, Herod Antipas ruled Galilee as a proxy leader for the Roman Empire. Though a minor figure, he had a major ego. He threw a birthday party for himself. All the bigwigs were there and Herod spared no expense to impress them.

His stepdaughter provided the main entertainment. She performed a dance so impressive that Herod offered her anything she wanted as reward — even half his kingdom!

But this young dancer was persuaded by her mother, Herodias, to ask for the head of John the Baptist on a platter!

Herod did not want to put John to death. He both feared and admired this prophet. However, since he had made a public promise in front of fellow power figures, Herod felt like he had no choice but to order the execution (see Mark 6:14-29).

This gory, ancient tale might not seem relevant to our modern era when "having his head on a platter" is merely figurative language for punishment. Here's the timeless takeaway: Herod would rather commit an evil act than appear weak or foolish in public. His pride prohibited him from doing the right thing. This is known as the sin of hubris.

The sad truth is that public health has gotten wrapped up in partisan politics. It is up to us to untangle the health of our neighbors from political hubris. I urge my fellow North Carolinians to contact N.C. House lawmakers before they submit their budget proposal later this summer. We must encourage and exhort them to support our state's people and economy by expanding health benefits to more than 600,000 frontline workers, parents and veterans.

Our House members need to hear from us! I hope they will have the courage to do what is right. Otherwise, as was the case long ago, innocent people will suffer the consequences to the detriment of their health, even their lives.

What's in a word? Could be plenty.

The good folks who listen to me in the morning from Sunday to Sunday — maybe "endure" would be a better word — know how I often speak of the importance of words and how we should strive to use the right one.

BOB WACHS
Movin' Around

And how we should keep them soft and sweet because we never know when we might have to eat them, and so on and so forth.

The reality of words is that they're about all we've got to convey thoughts and ideas and such, short of body language and action — not that those two aren't important in how we get thoughts and ideas across.

Anyway, from time to time I have thought about how the two vocations in which I have spent most of my life — journalism and pastoral ministry — both rise and fall on words and their correct and appropriate usage. In those two fields, the right word can be what saves the day and the wrong one can be the kiss of death.

Every profession, I know, has its quirks, failures and shortcomings. Doctors, I've heard it said, bury their mistakes and lawyers send theirs off to jail. Writers and speakers, however, tend to put their bad moves out in the public domain for all the world to see forever. In short, if it makes it into print or film or tape or DVD it's there forever.

I've had my share of them through the years. Once I did a piece for the local paper in which I lamented that much of our adult population still had trouble reading and writing and that the local community college had launched a program aimed at helping older folks (by definition, I guess, "non-teenagers") improve themselves in those areas.

Dutifully I did the story and then cast about for a headline and thought I'd prepared a good one when I set in type the words "Literacy still problem in Chatham" — and then followed it up with a smaller headline underneath proclaiming "CCCC working against it."

I'm pretty sure about 5,000 copies of that paper were printed before I got the chance to holler "Stop the presses," something I'd seen in movies and always wanted to do but did, I think, only this one time.

During the years of preparing newspaper pages and church bulletins, there have been similar instances. Now they're funny; at the time it wasn't always that way.

The curse isn't limited to only me. Many, if not most or all, of the folks who put pen to paper or fingers to keyboard have tasted it. A dear little lady who for years reported the goings and comings of a certain community in the local media once proclaimed that a young lad of that community was off serving in Uncle Sam's Navy on a vessel known as an LST (Landing Ship Tank — a big ol' boy whose front drops down so the tank can crawl off). The writer reported that the young sailor, as part of his duties, "took a trip on LSD."

If it's true misery loves company, and maybe laughs with it, a book I picked up some time ago, a collection of mis-typing, has given me cause to know they're everywhere. I especially enjoyed the one that said "The Fulton County Humane Society is hosting their 4th annual beagle barbecue. Come on and join them in this unique event," and the church newsletter item which read, "The church board of elders has called a special meeting today to decide what it did last week."

Bottom line is at least we're trying.

So, as a noted speaker and writer (me) said earlier "Keep your words soft and sweet; you never know when you might have to eat them."

And don't forget "please" and "thank you."

Especially in these hard times. Thank you.

Why do we shortchange teachers so badly?

The long history of females dominating the profession since the 1800s has more to do with the problem today than one may realize

On June 21, state Senate leaders presented a budget spending proposal that would slash corporate taxes and invest heavily in infrastructure. Despite the state's $6.5 billion surplus, public school teachers, under the Senate's proposal, would be awarded a mere 1.5% raise. For a state that's 47th out of the 50 states in starting teacher pay and 33rd in average teacher pay, that raise hardly seems "reasonable," as Senate Leader Phil Berger described it.

The earliest form of public schooling in American didn't begin until the mid-19th century. Before then, families who wanted to send their children to school had to pay tuition and were often limited to very few choices. In the 1830s, the spread of more accessible, taxpayer-supported schooling called for a substantially higher demand for teachers in many states.

Despite the fact that, at the time, most women were not as highly educated as their male peers, communities nonetheless sought females to fill teaching positions at newly established

"common schools." It was thought that women, some of whom had experience providing informal teaching or day-care services out of their homes for local children, could teach students the basics of reading, writing and arithmetic effectively and at a bargain cost. A notable quote recorded from a Littleton, Massachusetts, school committee meeting in 1849: "...it seems...very poor policy to pay a man 20 or 22 dollars a month, for teaching children the ABCs, when a female could do the work more successfully at one third of the price."

Despite a measly salary from the get-go, for many women of the time, teaching was an attractive option. Indeed, women were limited to highly specific gender roles well into the 20th century that often denied them access to a wider world of possibilities. Teaching was an opportunity to devote their minds to a greater purpose and to escape the restrictive confines of traditional womanhood.

The problem this history presents today is that, even in a post-second and third wave feminist era, teachers in the United States — male and female alike — suffer from a view of education that remains marred in part by the outdated, sexist ideology of the past.

Teaching is as much of an art and as much of a specialized practice as any other profession, including law and medicine. As a high school English teacher, I have to know how to craft an engaging curriculum that produces measurable mastery of literacy and writing benchmarks — arguably the two most critical skills for ensuring students' academic and, later on, career, success. I often have to spend many hours grading outside of my 8-hour work day in order to give my students the valuable feedback they need and deserve. I have to obtain a certain number of professional development hours and keep myself up-to-date on the newest research on effective pedagogical practices. I have a master's degree from a highly-ranked university. And yet, my colleagues and I earn, on average, "19% less than similarly skilled and educated professionals," according to the Economic Policy Institute.

In 1840, Massachusetts education reformer Horace Mann wrote, "The school committee are sentinels stationed at the door of every school house in the State, to see that no teacher crosses its threshold, who is not clothed, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, in garments of virtue." Although Mann uses the masculine pronoun, his belief that teachers should be models of morality, compassion and agents of nurturing as much as instructors of academic subjects was a view that helped further the argument that women in particular were eligible for teaching positions. The generally accepted belief at the time was that women were inherently maternal — they were naturally wired to care for children and to ensure their moral upbringing, even if, it seems, they received little reward for their work.

Fast-forward again to today, and there remains a clear legacy of the remnants of this narrow understanding of femininity in our expectations and treatment of teachers — a general attitude towards the profession that is sometimes referred to as teacher "martyrdom."

Teacher martyrdom is characterized by the notion that teachers do what they do for the benefit of their students only. It doesn't matter that the pay is minimal, the recognition rare or that they are often forced to take on extra, unpaid duties — teachers "do it for the kids," and if they complain about that not being enough, they're verging on selfishness. The assumption that teachers should be satisfied with their careers solely due to the fact that they get to care for and teach children is a clear vestige of the outmoded theory that women, with their moral purity and maternal instinct, will do anything and everything they can to "mother" the young. Since the feminization of the teaching profession was in part derived from this theory, it's no wonder that society's perspective on teachers today is still influenced by some of its underpinning tenets.

At some point, there are more cons than pros to staying in education, especially for those teachers with advanced degrees and years of experience. Many of them have already left teaching or are planning to leave. If we want the children of our state, of our country to have the quality education that is their right, if we want them to be taught by excellent teachers with high standards who will prepare them for adulthood, we must not only compensate teachers fairly, but we must work to rid ourselves of the deeply ingrained and deeply harmful view of educators as 'lesser' professionals.

What are the issues in today's tax rate debate?

Tax policy is always a controversial issue, and we're about to have another round of debate over taxes.

MIKE WALDEN
You Decide

At the national level, there are proposals to increase a variety of tax rates. Here in North Carolina, the discussion is about the opposite idea — to reduce some tax rates. In today's column I'll focus on the North Carolina tax rate debate!

There are two reasons tax rate reductions are now being considered in North Carolina. First, thanks to the generous federal fiscal assistance during the pandemic, North Carolina is flush with money and tax revenues. Once completed, the federal money flowing to North Carolina will be 15 times greater than the income lost from the COVID-19-induced recession. This will help boost the state's General Fund revenues by billions of dollars above previous forecasts.

Some want to send part of these gains back to taxpayers. Others want more spending on a variety of programs. Yet there's a potential problem with either big tax reductions or large spending increases. If the current gains in tax revenues are temporary, then making decisions based on short-term revenue spikes could lead to future problems when state revenues return to more normal levels.

Alternatively, instead of permanent tax reductions or spending increases, one-time tax rebates or temporary salary bonuses or spending initiatives — like infrastructure — could be used.

The second reason for considering tax rate cuts is embedded in a decade-long battle over the best way to use tax policy to stimulate the state's economy. One side argues tax rate cuts make North Carolina more attractive to business investment and job creation, thereby increasing the "economic pie." Some supporters of tax rate cuts think the economic pie could be enlarged so much as to produce more tax revenues than before the rate cuts.

The opposing side wants to keep current tax rates and spend more on education, job training and other related public programs. This viewpoint argues these initiatives generate economic growth in the long run by making workers more productive and valuable to businesses.

The idea of using tax rate cuts to boost the economy follows an economic philosophy called "supply-side economics." While popularized in the 1980s, supply-side economics is not a new idea. In fact, it's part of the very simple economic principle of incentives. If you want more of something, increase the incentive for providing it. In this case, if you want more economic production ("supply"), then increase the incentive for businesses and workers to make more. By reducing tax rates, companies and workers keep more of what they earn, thereby increasing their motivation to increase production.

One of the crucial issues in supply-side economics is whether more tax revenue is collected after the rate cut than before the cut. If the answer is "yes", then it's like — as my late mother used to say — "having your cake and eating it too."

As a simple example, say a 10% tax rate brings in $1 billion. If a cut to 5% collects $2 billion, then clearly both sides of the debate win. Those who want to stimulate the economy win, but those who want more funds for government programs also win.

This is why the tussle over tax rate cuts is, in part, an empirical issue where two questions need to be answered. First, do tax rate reductions boost the economy? Second, do tax rate cuts create even more tax revenue?

Several studies at the national level have addressed these questions, and the answers appear to be "yes" to the first question and "no" to the second. Tax rate cuts do result in more economic growth, at least temporarily. For example, after the 2017 federal tax rate reductions, economic growth jumped in 2018, but then in 2019 returned to growth rates existing prior to the rate cuts. Still, the additional production and jobs generated in 2018 weren't lost. It's just that the rate of increase in production and jobs slowed in 2019.

Regarding tax revenues, there's a strong consensus in the national studies that tax rate reductions don't produce more tax revenues; instead they lose tax revenues in total. However, there is some recovery due to faster economic growth. So, for example, say a tax rate is reduced from 10% to 5%. With no additional economic growth, tax revenues would fall by 50%. Based on the national studies, tax revenues would still fall, but by a rate closer to 30%.

Several years ago, I replicated the national studies for North Carolina. Interestingly, I found close to the same results for the state as other studies did for the nation. Lower tax rates — especially for the individual income tax and the sales tax — motivate more business activity; that is, the cuts grow the state economy. But total tax revenues fall, even after accounting for the revenues generated from new economic growth.

Both tax issues — whether we have too much tax revenues today due to the size of federal COVID help, and whether we need tax rate cuts to stimulate the economy — come down to the same question: how do we want spending to be split between the private sector and the public sector? Is spending best done by individuals, households and businesses, because they know what they want and value? Or is there spending that is needed and can only be done by the government?

I think most of us would agree that both types of spending are needed. The question is, where do we draw the line between private and public spending? That's a big, big you decide!

Hood should be careful when selectively applying statistics

TO THE EDITOR:

In his July 8-14 column ("What to do when they're wrong"), John Hood cited three "true" statements. They may be true, but at least two of them don't tell the whole story.

First, absolute poverty undoubtedly has gone down since 1960 (due in large part to social programs the John Locke Institute generally opposes). What the op-ed ignores is the accumulation of wealth by the top 10% of Americans. According to Wikipedia they controlled 70% of the wealth in the U.S. in 2019.

Not living in "absolute poverty" doesn't mean that all Americans are living decently. According to Bloomberg, 44% of Americans 18-64 are "low-wage" workers, i.e., earned less than two-thirds of the median wage for full-time workers adjusted by region. The Brookings Foundation estimated that 53 million Americans have a median wage of $10.22 an hour, with a median annual salary of $17,950. That level of income precludes home ownership (and, increasingly, renting adequate living quarters).

Finally, the statistics on killings by police that Mr. Hood cites indicate that whites, Blacks and Hispanics are killed by police generally in proportion to their percentage of the population. He then admits that Blacks and Hispanics are "disproportionally likely to die in this way." Since that seems counter to his argument he wishes it away by contrasting it to a statement that is completely different, saying it is not the same as saying that the police are more likely to shoot them "in similar circumstances."

Confused?? I was.

Statistics are not the whole truth, especially when applied selectively to make a political point.

Will government tap into Social Security?

TO THE EDITOR:

Although there is humor in Joe Heller's cartoon ("Help Wanted," the Chatham Brew, July 9) the flipside could turn all smiles upside down.

None of the stimulus checks are taxable. With the majority of Americans receiving stimulus checks instead of working, the government is receiving very little taxes from payroll checks. Because businesses have a problem getting anyone to work due to stimulus checks and their business is making little to no money, the government will be receiving little to no corporation taxes.

Some businesses may have to close their doors permanently, which means the government's loss of future corporation taxes. Businesses closing their doors would also mean loss of jobs for anyone who, in the future, would decide to work and pay taxes.

Since the money our government is spending comes from taxes paid by Americans, has anyone given thought to what happens when the government, due to the loss of taxes paid by Americans, is having trouble meeting its trillion dollar budget? My guess is, as always, the first money the government taps into will be Social Security. Will Social Security finally be depleted?

Beware of developers invoking a concern for the environment

TO THE EDITOR:

I read with interest the excellent update by Lars Dolder ("NCDOT doubles back on proposed highway alignment," July 1-7) on North Chatham Park Way and NCDOT's proposed destruction of the North Woods neighborhood. Mr. Dolder has followed this story closely and has talked to many key stakeholders.

Unfortunately, one of the stakeholders, Chuck Smith representing Preston Development Company, which is developing Chatham Park, has responded with dismissive double talk and an insincere concern for the environment.

While Mr. Smith claims to have nothing to do with the road, he speculates that NCDOT kept the alignment which will destroy North Woods because it will produce (1)

"much less environmental impact" and shifting the road off of North Woods would have shifted the impact (2) "onto other neighborhoods north of North Woods."

Point (1) is laughable considering that Chatham Park is proposing to clear about 2,000 acres of trees north of U.S. Hwy. 64 and surrounding the North Woods neighborhood to develop its North Village. Shifting the road to save North Woods will require crossing one ephemeral stream. While I have a vested interest, I'm trying to be objective ... I think building a small bridge seems like a fair trade to save a 40-year old neighborhood.

Point (2) is not true. My wife and I proposed an alternative that would hug the property line between North Woods and Chatham Park land and then turn to the northwest across our land towards 15-501, before continuing through Chatham Park land and then non-Chatham Park land that is already part of the project plan. In our proposal, no new properties would be affected, and both Chatham Park and "the Pavaos" would be left with a similar amount of property isolated on the "wrong" side of this limited access North Chatham Park Way, potentially setting up a land swap which would keep everyone whole.

I'm very happy to have an open, honest and transparent discussion, but let's keep to the facts and not insincere double-talk and recreated history.

We all want better schools

North Carolinians disagree about a great deal. But here's a proposition virtually all of us endorse: the future of our state is closely tied to the amount and quality of education our people receive.

I could say the future of North Carolina's economy depends on better education — and I'd be right! You only have to listen to what employers say about the importance of skilled employees who exhibit creativity, collaboration, and a strong work ethic. You only have to listen to what employees say about the value of what they learned, or should have learned, in school. And you only have to scan the dozens of studies that link average test scores or educational attainment to GDP and income growth.

To focus on economic considerations alone wouldn't fully capture what I mean, though. Education encompasses more than vocational training. It introduces learners to great swaths of human experience and accomplishment. It broadens perspective. It provides historical context. It builds character. It forms citizens. It fires the imagination.

It isn't just the future of North Carolina's economy that is at stake here, then. Better education will strengthen our relationships, our communities, our culture, and our democracy.

Easier said than done, of course. Progressives and conservatives tend to emphasize very different school reforms. That often leads one side to claim that the other side doesn't really share the goal of better education. I think such claims are profoundly mistaken and actively obstruct both policy debate and educational improvement.

As a conservative, I have long championed choice, competition, and rigorous standards as essential to boosting education in North Carolina. I believe these principles, well-established as important in other fields of endeavor, apply well to education. I also read the available empirical evidence as suggesting that choice, competition, and rigorous standards tend to make students better off, although the research findings are hardly unanimous and some of the effect sizes, while statistically significant, aren't very big.

For example, the journal Education Finance & Policy just published a paper by two researchers, Anna Egalite of N.C. State and Jonathan Mills of the University of Arkansas, that examined what happened when Louisiana instituted a scholarship program for students attending private schools in that state. Egalite and Mills concluded that the resulting competitive pressure tended to have positive effects on student performance in Louisiana's district-run public schools, although the effects were small and confined only to math.

I'll take those gains, however — because my further reading of the evidence is that nearly all education reforms have relatively modest effects by themselves, particularly when they are evaluated shortly after introduction and have not really been implemented to scale.

I support school choice and related reforms even as I also support direct measures to enhance public-school performance such as offering better recruitment, training, and incentives to school principals and giving great educators more ways to expand their impact — and earn higher salaries — through advanced teaching roles. There's no inconsistency here. Education is a complex enterprise. There's unlikely to be one single policy, teaching style, or school design that works best for every educator, student, and family in every community.

Add up many marginal or moderate gains and you end up with big gains. That's the practical approach. Just as the cause of school reform isn't advanced by demonizing opponents, it's also not enhanced by catastrophizing the issue. While we can and should do much better, North Carolina's public schools are already among the most effective in America. Adjusted for student demographics, North Carolina's 8th-graders ranked third in the nation in math and 11th in reading on the most-recent National Assessment of Educational Progress. That fact shouldn't make us complacent. But it should make reformers less likely to panic or fume if they don't immediately get their way.

One lesson we ought to impart to future generations of North Carolinians is that we can argue such issues in good faith, without impugning the motives of others.

Comic strips, O. Henry, and this column

It has happened again.

As reported in this column recently, the Library of America honored the late Elizabeth Spencer on June 1 by adding to its series an 864-page volume of her work. This month it adds another North Carolina connected author to its series, the popular short story writer, O. Henry.

The new volume, "O. Henry: 101 Stories," is being published this week. O. Henry was the pen name for William Sidney Porter, who was born in Greensboro in 1862 and grew up there. Shortly after he earned a license as a pharmacist and worked in his uncle's business, he moved west to work on a ranch in Texas. After a stint in prison for a crime that had to do with missing money, he made his way to New York City.

He found a home on the city's streets and bars, where he met the ordinary people who inspired his extraordinary stories. He was, according to Louis Menand, writing in The New Yorker's June 28 edition, "a prodigious drinker, with a reputation for being able to handle his liquor."

His drinking and rowdy life may have unleashed his writing, but it was not good for his health. He died in 1910, at 47, due in part to liver cirrhosis along with diabetes and an enlarged heart.

He is buried in Asheville's Riverside Cemetery not far from the grave of another North Carolina writer, Thomas Wolfe. Some visitors leave a few pennies on O. Henry's grave.

Some leave exactly $1.87.

Why?

For many O. Henry fans, their favorite story is "The Gift of the Magi," set in New York City at Christmastime. A poverty-stricken couple struggle to find money to buy each other a nice present.

The story begins: "One dollar and eighty-seven cents. That was all. And sixty cents of it was in pennies. Pennies saved one and two at a time by bulldozing the grocer and the vegetable man and the butcher until one's cheeks burned with the silent imputation of parsimony that such close dealing implied. Three times Della counted it. One dollar and eighty-seven cents. And the next day would be Christmas."

Finally, Della sells her lovely hair for $20 to buy a gold chain for her husband's treasured pocket watch. You remember what happened. If not, you can guess.

Such human dilemmas and remarkable endings made and still make O. Henry one of the country's favorite writers.

Like Charles Dickens he is more admired by us ordinary readers than by the literary elite.

Working for the Sunday World newspaper, he wrote a new story every week.

Menand suggests that such regularly written stories should be considered "on the model of the comic strip — which is, effectively, what they were when they appeared once a week in the Sunday World. In some weeks, your favorite comic strip is more entertaining than it is in others, but you always read it, because you know what you're going to get. The same is true of O. Henry stories. Porter had a formula; he had a set of character types; and he had a distinctive verbal palette."

One aside: I try, not always successfully, to persuade my editors that my weekly columns are similarly like comic strips.

Menand continues, "The story writer begins with an idea about what readers will feel when they finish reading, just as a lyric poet starts with a nonverbal state of mind and then constructs a verbal artifact that evokes it."

Not everyone will agree that O. Henry's stories are the same as good poetry. But this reader admits that reading "The Gift of the Magi" and many of his stories can bring tears to my eyes every time I read them.

On my next trip to Asheville, I will be leaving $1.87, including 60 pennies, on O. Henry's grave.

Senate budget heading to a veto

Wouldn't it be nice if our state elected officials worked together amicably to craft a biennial budget? One with the primary purpose of meeting needs instead of furthering political agendas? One passed in time to begin the new fiscal budget year?

For a while, in January, it looked like that might happen.

The governor, House Speaker and Senate Leader were making nice about cooperating, but that didn't last long. Gov. Cooper presented his budget proposals and they immediately started collecting dust on legislative shelves. It was evident the three couldn't even agree on a target amount of spending the first year. Cooper wanted $26.6 billion. The House advocated for $26.4 and the Senate $25.5 billion.

With a July 1 start of the new fiscal year staring them in the face the Senate finally presented a $25.7 billion budget June 21st. The House indicated it would be mid-July before they put theirs forward. The final product will be north of $26 billion, if history is any indicator.

We could go into detail discussing the pros and cons of the Senate budget, but it's not worth the effort. If their proposal (or anything similar to it) ends up passing, it will be dead on arrival on Gov. Cooper's desk. He will veto for several reasons, but perhaps the biggest is the special provisions contained in the document.

By their very nature special provisions are not actual spending proposals. They are items lawmakers want to become law but don't have enough votes to pass through the regular legislative process. Three of these provisions slipped into the budget are thinly veiled attacks against Democrats.

The first would limit future governors from declaring a state of emergency lasting more than 10 days. To extend it 45 more days would require approval from the Council of State; additional extensions must be approved by the legislature. Most emergencies, like weather-related events, are short lived, but when people are suffering or in danger, we don't need partisan political debates and committee decisions. Republicans didn't like when Cooper shut down businesses and was slow to reopen them during the pandemic. His decisions are largely affirmed. Our state reacted better than many during the pandemic and our economy has rebounded well.

The second is aimed at Democrat Attorney General Josh Stein. It would require the Attorney General to obtain approval from the Council of State before getting involved in litigation within out-of-state or federal courts in which the state isn't already specifically named. The AG could not agree to legal settlements involving constitutional challenges of state law without the approval of the Senate Leader and House Speaker. The legislature was mad because Stein approved the settlement of a lawsuit that allowed the deadline for receipt of absentee ballots to be extended to nine days after Election Day. He had also joined other states in challenging decisions made in areas like the Endangered Species Act, DACA and the U.S. Postal Service. Legislators say these are political lawsuits and the Attorney General should not be involved without their approval.

The third provision takes aim at the Democratically-controlled

State Board of Elections (SBOE).

It would remove the organization's investigative authority and transfer it to the State Bureau of Investigations, an agency already overloaded with work. The board has three members from the party of the sitting governor and two from the opposing party. Republican leadership was angered when the board voted unanimously last year to accept a settlement agreement that would allow November's elections to go forward. The SBOE would have no power to agree to court settlements when the legislature is not in session.

Not only will these power grabs be quickly vetoed but they are likely unconstitutional and short sighted. Republican leadership is failing to acknowledge that the pandemic was a once-in-a-century disaster and ignore the reality that sooner or later the political shoe will be on the other foot.

It will be interesting to see how the House budget compares and contrasts with the Senate. The larger question is whether Cooper's veto will stick, as it has in recent years. We will watch with fascination whether the four Democrats who voted for the Senate budget will fold under extreme pressure and vote along party lines or vote to override the veto. Time will tell whether we are still in a time warp or can approve the first state budget since 2017. State government is becoming as partisan and ineffective as our federal government.

TEMPLE

According to its website, the temple is set to be located on the banks of the Deep River on the Chatham side of the Chatham County-Lee County line. The listed address is 272 First Road, Moncure, which is near the U.S. 1 highway.

Previously, one of the temple's donors, Radha Ravi Varma, told the News + Record that there was no set date for constructing the temple, but that it might take “five to ten years to start the construction.” Dass said the target for the statue and building is 6-10 years.

While the first phase of construction will include a 6-foot Murugan statue, the group still plans to eventually add the 155-foot monument, advertised on its website in 2019 as “the tallest statue of Lord Murugan in the world.”

“Our immediate goal is to operationalize the Moncure site as quickly as possible, with a minimal budget,” the temple's website says. “We have been tirelessly working with Site Design Engineers, Surveyors, County government, and other agencies to accelerate the permitting process. This approval will give us the green light to construct the full temple or temporary structure for us to operate at the site.”

Carolina Murugan Temple submitted its Phase 1 plan in December 2020, Dass told the News + Record, with review still in process.

“We hope to get it approved soon,” Dass said.

The land is zoned R-1 Residential, which means the temple, like other places of worship, doesn't require site plan approval from the county's Planning Board or Board of Commissioners under county ordinances.

Drew Blake, on staff with Chatham County's Watershed Protection department, said the county is currently waiting for revisions to the temple's plan before moving forward.

“The Carolina Murugan Temple is still in the plan review process for Soil Erosion and Sedimentation Control as well as Stormwater,” he said in an email. “We are currently waiting for a plan revision submittal based on our last round of comments.”

The temple's website previously said the temple would promote economic growth as well as bring social and charitable programs for the residents of North Carolina. Since its founding in 2018, there are more than 260 temple members, 310 volunteers and the temple has hosted 21 events.

“The Carolina Murugan Temple will provide an experience of Tamil spiritual heritage and language to the international community in North Carolina,” the website stated in 2019, when the News + Record first reported on the temple. “Our objective is to retain the traditional culture and rituals performed by Tamils for thousands of years and will follow ‘Lord Muruga's Tamizh Vazhipaattu Murai’ in all ceremonies and celebrations.”

Eventually, the website says the land will feature not only a temple, but a wedding area, playground, world cultural museum and more. The group chose to build in Chatham County because of its proximity to Research Triangle Park and the availability of land, the News + Record previously reported.

Elon University Religious Studies Professor Amy Allocco told the News + Record in March 2019 that temples like the Carolina Murugan Temple are significant for Hindus who don't live in India. Allocco studied abroad in the Indian state of Tamil Nadu, the home of the Tamils, as an undergrad and regularly visits the state for research as a professor.

“In places where Hindus are the minority, like North Carolina, temples take on important community functions,” she said at the time. “They become community centers in important ways. If you're a young Hindu kid in North Carolina, you might go there to learn about the deities and the language and the history of your religion.”

Plans for the proposed Carolina Murugan Temple, slated for Moncure just east of U.S. Hwy. 1, originally included a 155-foot statue of the Hindu god Murugan to be placed on the shores of the Deep River.

While the website indicates its preliminary planning phase is 100% complete, Phase 1 is listed at 10%.

“The availability of the funds is the primary limiting factor,” the website says, “and it will be a major constraint for us to accelerate the approval and construction process. We will need approximately 1.9 Million US dollars to get the infrastructure and other utilities.”

THOMPSON

the planning department's recommendations for land and infrastructure development requests. She has also been Pittsboro's point person in recent months as the town completed its Unified Development Ordinance.

The Siler City resident has worked for years helping planning departments in other towns and counties around North Carolina to improve their workflows and establish strong relationships with residents. Now she's poised to assume what might be the greatest undertaking of her career: strengthening a skeletal planning department into something robust enough to keep pace with the east coast's fastest growing community.

The News + Record caught up with Thompson (whose husband, Bryan, is Chatham County's assistant county manager) to see how she's settling into the new role and what plans she has for her first few months.

To reach Thompson, Pittsboro residents can call 919-542-2063. The planning department is housed at Chatham Mills and is open from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., Monday through Friday, with in-person services currently limited to permitting and planning submittals. Although walk-in customers are accepted, the town encourages residents to use recently improved online services and mail-in submittals when possible.

First things first, can you tell me a little about your background and how long you've been in planning?

I'm from Fort Bragg, N.C., and have a B.S. in Community and Regional Planning from Appalachian State. Having nearly 15 years of experience, I have served as a planner in several communities, including the planning director in Montgomery County (two years), planning director for the Town of Lillington (six years), as well as the planning supervisor for the Moore County Planning Department (six years).

You said in a recent board of commissioners meeting that you've long wanted to work in Pittsboro. Can you elaborate on that, and tell me how you finally ended up here?

After moving to Chatham County in 2013, my family and I have always enjoyed visiting Pittsboro, exploring its charming downtown and enjoying all the fun shops and restaurants. I would often think about how great it would be to work in a town with so much going on, so when I saw the planning position open up last year I didn't think twice before applying.

Before we get into some of what you hope to accomplish, can you explain what exactly your role and responsibilities include? How would you describe the planning director's job?

I think the planning director helps sets the tone for the department. Part of my job is to help make the planning department an inviting place for anyone to feel welcome and know that we are here to help. I also know how stressful a workplace can be, so I want to be there for the planning staff. We have a new department, so my main goal right now is creating a productive and healthy work environment. We all have specific skills and abilities and I want to help foster everyone's interests in how we craft our roles and responsibilities.

What's happening with staffing and how will it affect the way you all serve the town? I know already you've brought on some new folks. Can you tell me about those positions and what your longer term plans are for the department?

Currently we are a department of four. Two new planners were recently hired. Both are a good fit with what is needed for the department including being able to handle a challenging workload. Our customer service specialist is also a vital part of our team and is really the backbone of our department. She not only helps with planning but also helps keep the parks, engineering and public utilities departments running smoothly. So, along with the two new planners recently hired we are going to be hiring two additional planner positions this upcoming fiscal year. We also have a lot of housekeeping to do such as updating our processes, checklists and filing systems.

Can you talk about how Pittsboro is poised for growth as you see it from your perspective? I would guess there aren't many times a planning director knows so clearly that she'll be overseeing enormous expansion within just a couple of coming decades. Is that daunting, exciting, useful, etc.?

Growth management tools, such as the Unified Development Ordinance and Land Use Plan, assist the town in implementing standards that influence the type and location of new development. Part of the planning department's responsibilities includes drafting land development standards, per direction by the planning board and town board, enabling the town to grow in an organized and sustainable manner. We will also assist in updating the Land Use Plan, which is an important tool in managing desired and expected growth, which is consistent with the community's vision.

Any standout projects that you think are especially exciting? Maybe you could share a bit of timeline on big milestones to come?

It's great seeing all the work going on downtown — seeing the vision of the downtown business community taking shape is impressive. It is encouraging to see how this space is being well-maintained and improved to create greater access and opportunity for the community to come together and to showcase the Pittsboro experience. I am also eager for us to work on UDO updates. I've listened and have taken notes on questions and concerns raised over the last several months and am ready to draft language and provide options to the boards to make the UDO more tailored to Pittsboro.

Are there any things I didn't address that you'd like people to know about you, your new role, the department or anything else?

Planning departments sometimes have a reputation of being difficult to work with. I think this is largely due to our responsibility to process development applications and permits according to the local development ordinances. While this is the reality of the work we do, I definitely want everyone to know that the Pittsboro Planning Department is committed to providing exceptional customer service and working for success with all citizens and our business community.

SERVING AGAIN

Meals being offered at Council on Aging's Western Center in Siler City

From the Chatham Council on Aging

SILER CITY — After shutting down in-person meals nearly 16 months ago, the Chatham County Council on Aging reopened to congregate meals at its Western Chatham Senior Center (WCSC) in Siler City last week.

Given the high effectiveness of the vaccines, the Council allowed fully-vaccinated participants to return to in-person meals.

"Because the senior population is most at risk of the negative effects of COVID-19, we wanted to remain cautious as we reopened but felt we could safely do so now," said COA Director Dennis Streets.

Last Wednesday, the long-empty tables were filled with people in brightly colored, flowered clothes. They had dressed to match the Hawaiian theme. Staff members wore decorative grass-skirts and handed out leis.

There was a summery, festive atmosphere as friends gathered for photos together, happy smiles across each face. People sipped bright lime-green drinks and some line-danced as they waited for lunch to be served. Joining in the festivities was David Kennedy who announced his retirement as Chatham County's Veterans Service Officer.

The program kicked off with a pre-recorded welcome back message from Chatham County Health Director Mike Zelek. He expressed deep gratitude to the participants for "getting their shot" and shared that the COA could only reopen to in-facility programming because they had done so. He also asked them to be ambassadors to encourage friends and family to get vaccinated for their own safety and to protect others.

Some participants had not engaged in the virtual program offerings of the Council on Aging. Returning to in-person meals and programming was particularly important.

"I'm so glad to be back," said participant Cathy Glover.

Another participant, Josephine Cotton, just celebrated her 83rd birthday and also expressed how happy she was to be coming to the WCSC.

Despite the joy at seeing one another again, there was a sense of what had been lost during the pandemic and COA's closure to in-person programs. Joyce Stout shared photo albums she has been maintaining since 2015. One album has photos of the WCSC participants and another, with the words "Gone but not forgotten" on the front, memorializes those who have passed over the years.

"One person died with the virus," she said, "and others passed away while we were closed. We were lucky it wasn't more."

Staff members were also eager to get back to serving meals at the Western Center.

Carol Hammer, 79, passed out meals, served cupcakes and cleaned up afterwards, disinfecting each table. "I'm so happy to see everyone back here," she said. Carol has worked for the Council on Aging for more than 16 years and is planning to fully retire at the end of the month. "I was supposed to leave the middle of July, but Dennis asked me to stay on a little longer through the reopening."

She said she's been working since she was 12 and "is looking forward to spending more time with my grandkids, reading and going to the beach." Carol's husband, Garrett, delivers meals with the Council's Meals on Wheels program.

"I'll help him do that, I'm sure," she shared, planning to stay connected to the Council on Aging.

"We are monitoring the news and staying in close contact with the Chatham County Health Department to inform any decisions we make with regards to the virus variants now circulating," Streets said.

"But for now we feel we are taking actions to prevent the spread of COVID-19 while supporting the social, emotional and physical wellbeing of our participants."

The reopening was a success and people fell smoothly back into their old routines. Participants came last week for a reopening orientation. They were registered into the new My Senior Center software system the COA installed over the pandemic and got back into the rhythm of taking Chatham Transit.

"I was really impressed with how well run it all was," said Irma Beal, who expressed gratitude that people could come back face-to-face and, when asked about the vaccine, said: "I got mine. I wish more people would take it."

Because of planned construction at the Eastern Chatham Senior Center in Pittsboro, only the Western Center is opening to meals and activities. People who are fully vaccinated will be attending two days per week with hopes to increase to daily service soon.

In addition to its congregate meals program, the Council on Aging is beginning to resume other programs and expand its services. Jackie Green and Olivia Hayden are leading aquatic exercise classes for people with arthritis.

Shirley Brooks attended the class before coming to the Senior Center for lunch. "It feels so good and it is easy on my joints," she said. "I've been doing some of the virtual things like bingo while they were closed, but I'm glad to be back in person again."

Board member Rev. Neriah Edwards-Boone came to see the reopening.

"It's good to be back in this place and see people here," she shared. "I would have been here earlier but I was at the Council's virtual yoga class."

The Council's Meals on Wheels program, which had been providing frozen and shelf-stable meals weekly, returned to daily meal delivery on July 12th. COA Board President Larry Ross will be one of the many volunteers it takes to make this program happen. While at the reopening of the Western Center, he said "I'm looking forward to seeing everyone again."

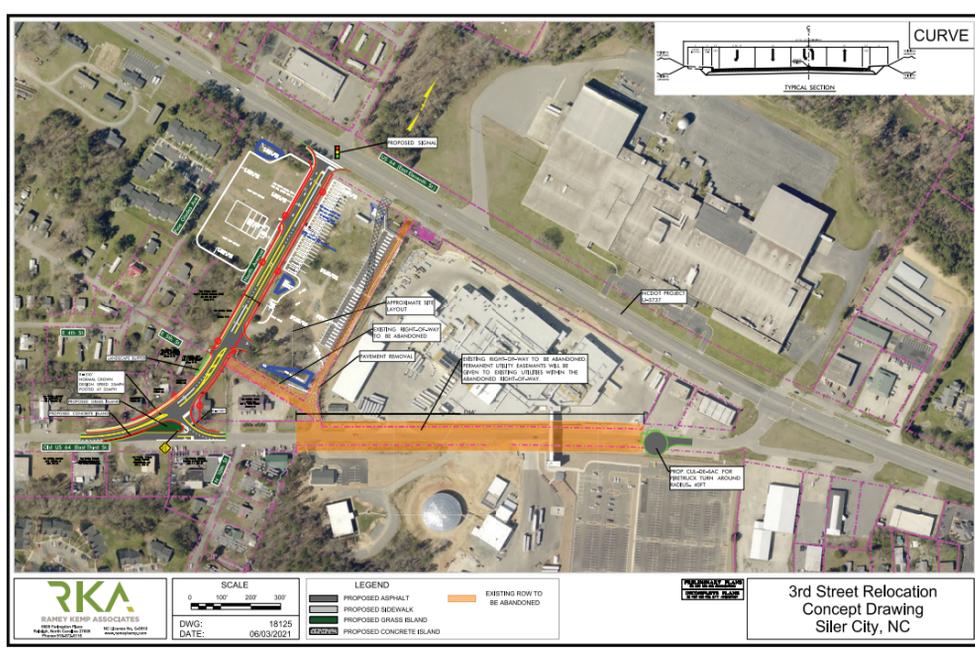

The Council still seeks a few more volunteers to help deliver meals in some of the more rural areas of Chatham. Interested volunteers can contact Allison Andrews at 919-542-4512 or via email at allison.andrews@chathamcouncilonaging.org.

How does Social Security Fit into Retirement?

Here's something to think about: You could spend two, or even three, decades in retirement. To meet your income needs for all those years, you'll generally need a sizable amount of retirement assets. How will Social Security fit into the picture?

For most people, Social Security won't be enough to cover the cost of living in retirement. Nonetheless, Social Security benefits are still valuable, so you'll want to do whatever you can to maximize them.

Your first move is to determine when you should start taking Social Security. You can begin collecting benefits when you reach 62 – but should you? If you were to turn 62 this year, your payments would only be about 71% of what you'd get if you waited until your full retirement age, which is 66 years and 10 months. ("Full retirement age" varies, depending on when you were born, but for most people today, it will be between 66 and 67.) Every month you wait between now and your full retirement age, your benefits will increase. If you still want to delay taking benefits beyond your full retirement age, your payments will increase by 8% each year, until you're 70, when they "max out." Regardless of when you file, you'll also receive an annual cost-of-living adjustment.

So, when should you start claiming your benefits? There's no one "right" answer for everyone. If you turn 62 and you need the money, your choice might be made for you. But if you have sufficient income from other sources, you're in good health and you have longevity in your family, or you're still working, it might be worthwhile to wait until your full retirement age, or perhaps even longer, to start collecting.

Another key consideration is spousal benefits. If your own full retirement benefit is less than 50% of your spouse's full retirement benefit, you would generally be eligible to claim spousal benefits, provided you're at least 62 and your spouse has filed for Social Security benefits.

Survivor benefits are another important consideration. When you pass away, your spouse would be able to receive up to 100% of your benefit or his/her own retirement benefit, whichever is higher. Thus, delaying Social Security could not only increase your own benefit, but also the benefit for your surviving spouse.

An additional issue to think about, when planning for how Social Security fits into your retirement, is your earned income. If you're younger than full retirement age, your benefit will be reduced by $1 for each $2 you earn above a certain amount, which, in 2021, is $18,960. During the year you reach full retirement age, your benefit will be reduced by $1 for each $3 you earn above a set amount ($50,520 in 2021). But once you hit the month at which you attain full retirement age, and from that point on, you can keep all of your benefits, no matter how much you earn (although your benefits could still be taxed).

One final point to keep in mind: The more you accumulate in your other retirement accounts, such as your IRA and 401(k) or similar employer-sponsored plan, the more flexibility you'll have in managing your Social Security benefits. So, throughout your working years, try to contribute as much as you can afford to these plans.

board's June meeting are examples of larger projects requiring debt issuance.

In the case of large capital projects, Thompson said bonds are often a more attractive method of borrowing because the bond issuer — in this case, the county — is able to lock in a longer-term interest rate, often lower than lending traditional of a bank.

"The lower the interest rate for the borrower, the less the loan ends up costing," he said.

Unlike a General Obligation Bond (GO Bond), a LOB does not require a vote from the electorate. Instead, it requires a majority vote of the governing body of the local government. Whereas a GO Bond usually requires an increase in the local property tax to cover the bond debt, a LOB uses existing revenue sources.

Though the board approved the issuance of the bond, Chatham's fiscal health and economic outlook will be rated at some point this month by Standard and Poor's

(S&P) and Moody's before moving forward in securing the bond. (The county's last bond rating in 2018 by the same agencies was AAA and Aa1, Thompson said, ratings that essentially indicate a strong capacity to repay investors and the debt.)

The county hopes for its AAA rating from S&P to remain and for the Moody's Aa1 rating to be improved one step, to an AAA rating, Thompson added.

"Once rated and approved by the Local Government Commission (LGC), the principal amount approved by the Board of Commissioners will be placed on the market for pricing with investors in early August," he said. "This will provide the county with the monetary capital for these two capital projects and to potentially refinance portions of existing county debt obligations."

The school system's Central Services Building design was approved by the district's board of education in May 2020. It's slated to be built on Renaissance Drive five miles west of Pittsboro off of U.S. Hwy. 64. The one-story, 38,000-square-foot facility will eventually replace the current building on West Street.

In the approved fiscal year 2021-27 CIP document developed by the Chatham County government, the building was projected to cost $11,142,055 to construct. That document stated that the current West Street building "exceeded its capacity resulting in the creation of inefficient satellite offices around the county," and "has surpassed its intended lifespan and is in need of costly repairs."

Estimated costs for both projects increased in the approved 2022-28 CIP document due to "updated construction estimates." The Emergency Center budget was increased by $3,873,651 and the CCS building by $3,857,945.

The existing Emergency Operations Center (EOC), meanwhile, also located on Pittsboro's West Street, was completed in 1994 and houses the EOC meeting room where decision makers gather during disasters, as well as the 911 Communications Center. The communications room was built to hold four telecommunicator consoles, and in recent years, the number of consoles increased to six.

"If existing estimates for population growth in Chatham County are fulfilled, the Communications Division will need to hire more full-time telecommunicators," the CIP document recommending a new center says. "This will require more consoles and associated equipment. Since the communications room is currently filled to capacity, there is no room for this needed expansion."

Thompson said county-wide growth will mean providing for the replacement of aged facilities and infrastructure, as well as "the construction of new facilities to meet the dynamic needs of our community." That new building is also set to be built on Renaissance Drive.

"As Chatham County continues to grow, so too will the demands on it for providing quality and responsive public services," he said. "For many years now, the Chatham County Board of Commissioners, along with our staff and management, has taken practical and proactive measures to forecast these needs and to consistently exercise a disciplined strategy to meet these needs in a fiscally responsible way."

WATER

+ Record, and have taken daily samples since. A first round of results, which was processed at Reidsville's Meritech Labs, came back last Wednesday.

In the immediate wake of Greensboro's contamination, 1,4-Dioxane levels at Pittsboro's raw water intake were non-detectable. Two days later a raw water sample included 76.5 ppb, and later samples showed 38.2 ppb and 43.7 ppb over the next few days — all in excess of the EPA's guidelines. Finished water at Pittsboro's water tanks contained much lower concentrations of 1,4-Dioxane, none higher than 5.56 ppb.

On Monday, though, town representatives announced a troubling inference: there appears to have been at least a second discharge of 1,4-Dioxane from Greensboro, they say, although none had been officially reported. A new batch of water samples showed a spike in 1,4-Dioxane levels at Pittsboro's water intake a week after the initial scare.

Raw water samples from July 6 showed 1,4-Dioxane ranging from 26.5 ppb to 93.6 ppb, a higher ceiling than earlier detected. The chemical's concentration in treated drinking water was also elevated. At the Chatham Forest water tank, levels were as high as 66.8 ppb. The town's 1.0M tank showed 21.7 ppb. Treated water from the Horton tank was much lower, just 1.71 ppb.

"Town staff believes that these numbers indicate a delayed or secondary influx of 1,4-Dioxane reaching the Pittsboro raw water intake with what appears to be an additional slug of contamination coming from Greensboro on or immediately before July 6, 2021 ..." Town Manager Chris Kennedy said in a statement.

Upon seeing the test results, town staff flushed the Chatham Forest tank and refilled it with what they "expect to be less contaminated finished water given the raw water contamination diminishment from July 6 (93.6 ppb) to July 7 (26.5 ppb)," the press release said. "From a strategic perspective, the Town is continually turning over the stored water in our water tanks more frequently than usual to continually refresh the water with improved and better quality finished water so that 1,4-Dioxane contaminated water exits our public supply as quickly as possible."

As of press time Tuesday, two weeks following the initial 1,4-Dioxane contamination, the chemical's original source remained unknown. Greensboro is obligated to limit 1,4-Dioxane discharge per a Special Order of Consent between the city and NCDEQ signed in February. The SOC stipulates no more than 45 parts per billion of 1,4-Dioxane may be discharged per day.

The agreement was triggered in 2019 after the discovery that Shamrock Environmental — an environmental and industrial waste management services company — was dumping 705 parts per billion to 1,210 parts per billion of 1,4-Dioxane at the TZ Osborne plant. The Shamrock location in Greensboro is a tanker cleaning facility that also manages wastewater and recycles drilling mud.

Water samples of Shamrock's effluent showed 98.8 ppb of 1,4-Dioxane on July 6 and July 7 and 466 ppb on July 7 in a "flume grab" — water which had not been mixed with other sources at the wastewater treatment plant. But Greensboro spokesperson Elijah Williams, in an interview with N.C. Policy Watch, said Shamrock was not the source of contamination appearing in Pittsboro's water.

"Accounting for dilution factors," the report said, "Shamrock's levels would need to have been much higher for it to be responsible for this spill."

Other potential sources of the contaminant had not been released as of press time. The only official, public notice from Greensboro is the original announcement from July 1 on the town's website.

"City staff has notified and is in coordination with the N.C. Department of Environmental Quality (NCDEQ) and downstream utilities and is actively investigating possible sources of the substance," it reads.

The notice points out "this discharge does not affect Greensboro's drinking water quality."

"So that's what Greensboro is working on," Pickett, Pittsboro's water superintendent, said, "trying to figure out where this source is coming from all of a sudden. And we're working with Greensboro, as well, so hopefully we can get this knocked down pretty quick."

It's unclear whether the City of Greensboro or private companies identified as having discharged 1,4-Dioxane into the Haw will be required by NCDEQ to pay financial penalties for the contamination.

Despite the second spike in 1,4-Dioxane levels, and the uncertainty of the chemical's source location, Pittsboro staff maintain the town's drinking water is safe for consumption.

"While the numbers are above non-detect based on the latest sample results," Kennedy said in the release, "we are encouraged by the drop from July 6 to July 7 in our raw water sample and the trends shown in Greensboro's water grab ... trending towards a non-detection level."

A third round of water sample results were expected to be released after press time. For the latest on Pittsboro's water quality, check back on chathamnewsrecord.com.

'WE CAN CONTINUE THEIR ATHLETIC TRADITION'

Tommy Peele, Chatham Central's new AD, brings years of experience to the job

BY VICTOR HENSLEY
News + Record Staff

BEAR CREEK — Chatham Central's athletic department will have new leadership this fall.

As fans file into Bears' sporting events this school year — from football games to tennis matches — a new face will be there to greet them and make sure everything's running smoothly.

Tommy Peele, the former athletic director at J.S. Waters School in Goldston, has been named the school's newest AD, effective July 1.

Peele takes over for Bob Pegram, the former Bears' head football coach that had been the school's AD for nearly a decade, who announced his retirement this spring.

And though it's the middle of summer and sports aren't slated to resume until August, Peele is already started preparing for what life will be like once the school year begins.

"So far, it's been a lot of ... (learning) all of the different programs that we use, such as Home-Town Ticketing, BigTeams — which has to do with our athletic paperwork — and Schedule Star," Peele told the News + Record on Monday. "So, there's been a wide variety of things and it'll continue to be that until we get started. ... I'm just trying to adapt and learn my new role as efficiently as I can."

Over the last two school years, he's gotten the taste of the AD position through his work at J.S. Waters. But he'll be one of the firsts to tell you that high school sports is a different beast than you'll find at other grade levels.

Digital paperwork and ticket sales — of which usage has only increased since the COVID-19 pandemic — account for a couple of the major differences between the middle and high school levels, making his job just a bit more nuanced.

"I know it's going to be a challenging role, especially early on in this first year or two, kind of getting used to my role and other responsibilities and getting everything down," Peele said. "And, of course, still possibly dealing with COVID restrictions somewhat. We're not sure what's going to happen, especially with indoor sports."

Stars, stripes and silence: Olympics' choice to ban fans is right call

Even though we're in 2021, the 2020 Summer Olympics may be aptly named.

After a recent announcement by Tokyo 2020 president Seiko Hashimoto, the atmosphere at the Olympic Games will look a lot like sporting events did last year.

"We wanted a full stadium so community people could get involved in welcoming the athletes so we could have a full presentation of the power of sports," Hashimoto said in a press conference last week. "However, now faced with COVID-19, we have no other choice but to hold the Games in a limited way."

The press conference followed a decision made by the governments of Tokyo and Japan at large, as well as both the International Olympic and Paralympic Committees, to ban all fans — both local and foreign — from attending this year's Summer Olympics, slated to begin on July 23 and last until Aug. 8.

The decision came after Japanese Prime Minister Yoshihide Suga declared a state of emergency in the nation's capital due to a spike in COVID-19 cases. The emergency is set to remain effective until Aug. 22, encapsulating the entirety of the Olympics.

And it's going to cost the country a pretty penny.

According to a recent USA Today piece, revenue from Olympic ticket sales was expected to be around $800 million, which would have at least been able to make a tiny dent in the Games' official $15.4 billion price tag. Now, that ticket revenue number drops to $0 while the cost of the Olympics — which the article claims could actually be as high as $30.8 billion — continues to increase.

In addition to the financial strain the decision puts on Japan and its citizens, it's going to make for one strange Olympic, but after last year, we're no stranger to out-of-the-ordinary sporting events. You could say we're experts.

In 2020, the sports world as a whole became all too familiar with delays, cancellations and capacity limits. Many of which

In 2017, Corbie Hill overcame leukemia, started running, and got in the best shape of his life. Then in May, his cancer returned.

BY BILL HORNER III

*They say my days aren't guaranteed
I want more years ahead than behind
I'm sick like a troubled waterway
A salmon swimming blind through industrial waste
I know my way is hard
I sing my survivor song*

- From "Survivor Song," by Corbie Hill

PITTSBORO — There was a time in his life, just four short years ago, when Corbie Hill would have found it difficult to envision himself as a runner.

Much less a fast one. But the 39-year-old Pittsboro resident is definitely that, and a racer, too. And if you're around the Chatham Community Library around 7 most weekday mornings, and you spot a lean, tattooed man striding by with a receding hairline and two fashionable earrings, rest assured that it's Hill.

And as of this past month, he's something else: a two-time leukemia survivor.

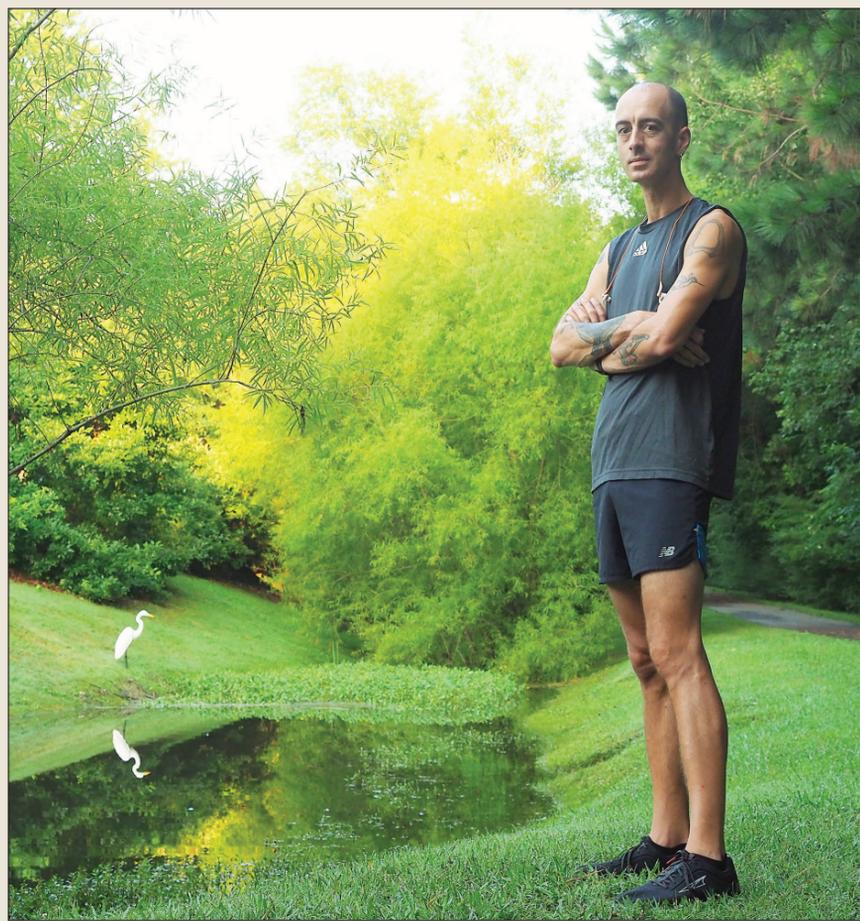

It was back on May 12 that Hill made this new diagnosis public with a Facebook post, which began with: "Hey, everyone. Here's a long update. It starts with the words 'my cancer came back'..."

From 5K to couch

A few months before, back in December, Hill was the fastest he'd ever been. In the last month of 2020, he logged three 5K runs in times under 21 minutes, a pace for the 3.1-mile distance that most recreational runners could only dream of.

But as winter waned and spring approached, Hill began to feel fatigued. He saw a drop in his endurance. His 5K times began to be slower and slower, and slower still.

"But then I couldn't break 22:00," Hill wrote in the Facebook post. "And then I couldn't break 23:00; then 24:00 eluded me. Same effort, same energy, but diminished returns."

Then there was the pain and the anemia.

"I had a headache, like a piercing headache that lasted for eight straight days," he said recently, recalling the worst of that stretch. "Nothing would touch it. And just this unimaginable exhaustion. I went from being someone who would run a 5K and lift weights

Four takeaways from the first half of the MLB season

1. It's Ohtani's world, and we're just living in it

If you couldn't tell from the All-Star game festivities, Shohei Ohtani is one of the new faces of baseball. Not only did he participate in the Home Run Derby and bat leadoff for the American League in the All-Star Game on Tuesday, he became the first player in league history to start the All-Star Game as both a hitter and pitcher. And even though he lost in the first round of the derby, he drew the eyes of the entire baseball world with just his presence. He leads the league in home runs, triples and total bases, all while posting elite numbers on the mound.

The Japanese-born phenom has already broken Hideki Matsui's record for the most home runs in a single MLB season by a Japanese player. It's his MVP to lose and from what he's shown through these last three months, he'll be in the conversation for years to come.

2. MLB's crackdown on foreign substances off to a shaky start

MLB's decision to begin inspecting pitchers for banned substances nearly halfway through the season hasn't been smooth. When a pitcher walks off the mound following an inning, the umpires inspect him for sticky stuff that could be used to doctor baseballs and improve their grip of the ball. Naturally, pitchers had a wide array of reactions, including relief pitcher Sergio Romo nearly stripping off his entire uniform in protest and Washington Nationals pitcher Max Scherzer engaging in a shouting match with Philadelphia Phillies manager Joe Girardi after Girardi asked for him to be checked multiple times in the middle of an inning.

One can only wonder why MLB waited until June to implement this rule. And is it really necessary to check a pitcher after he allows multiple runs? But with spin rates down after the new rule, there's hope that this can ultimately improve the game. It might just take a little getting used to.

3. Red Sox, Giants, prove they're not pretenders in elite divisions

Judging from their 2020 seasons, these two elite franchises seemed destined for another year of a slight rebuild. The Red Sox, who finished in last place in the AL East after trading Mookie Betts to the Dodgers, were relatively quiet in the offseason. Stacked against the Bronx Bombers and reigning AL Champion Tampa Bay Rays, it seemed unlikely that they would compete, much less lead the division at the halfway point.

But the Red Sox bullpen, led by All-Star Matt Barnes, has Boston tied for the best record in the league. Even more surprising is that the Giants lead the 2020 World Series champion Los Angeles Dodgers and San Diego Padres heading into the break. The resurgence of catcher Buster Posey, who is batting .328, has the Giants offense clicking. And if Jacob deGrom wasn't in the picture, Kevin Gausman might have himself a Cy Young-worthy year, with a 1.73 earned run average.

4. A new generation of young talent has taken over the game

Three of the game's most exciting players — Vladimir Guerrero Jr., Fernando Tatis Jr., and Ronald Acuña Jr. are now the face of the sport and none of them are older than 23. Even Ohtani, who spent the beginning of his career in Japan before coming to America, is 27 years old. Those four players are among the top five home run hitters in baseball.

But it's not just their statistics that have viewers eager to watch them play. They each play the game with a bit of flare that the game had been longing for. Tatis and Acuña's bat flips after game-winning home runs bring a new level of excitement and the young stars have challenged some of the game's ridiculous unwritten rules. And unlike Mike Trout, who has dominated the game over the last decade but is not the most marketable superstar, these younger players don't shy away from the limelight. The MLB should market these bled into 2021.

But things slowly began to come back to normal as the vaccination train got rolling earlier this year. COVID-19 restrictions started to lift across the nation — and the world — as fans trickled back into arenas. For the first time in nearly a year, the crowd noise we heard after highlight-worthy plays were real fans instead of artificial, pumped-in recordings.

In many areas of the world, sports are starting to heal and fans are back.

Last weekend, for example, was dubbed the "Weekend of Champions" by ESPN. And rightfully so.

In a three-day span, sports fans got to enjoy:

Karolína Plíšková) and Gentlemen's (Novak Djokovic vs. Matteo Berrettini) Finals

- Soccer: UEFA EURO 2020 Final, Italy vs. England

- Soccer: Copa América 2020 Final, Argentina vs. Brazil

- Basketball: NBA Finals, Game 3, Phoenix Suns vs. Milwaukee Bucks

- MMA: UFC 264, Dustin Poirier vs. Conor McGregor

In short, you'd be hard-pressed to find a better weekend of sports this year. And while part of that is due to the level of competition, the stars in action and the numerous storylines floating around every event, the weekend was also thrilling because of one major component: the atmosphere.

At least 60,000 people were in attendance at Wembley Stadium in London to see Italy's historic victory on Sunday.

An announced crowd of 20,062 saw McGregor's ankle seemingly snap in half at T-Mobile Arena in Paradise, Nevada, on Saturday.

Even the Copa América final on Saturday had a limited capacity of 10% (6,500 fans) at Maracanã Stadium in Rio de Janeiro.

And trust me, you could feel the energy through your TV screen.

All of these packed arenas and stadiums create a strong juxtaposition when paired with last week's Tokyo 2020 news, as athletes who have been hard at work to make their Olympic dreams come true will now have to perform in front of vacant stands and plenty of TV cameras.

However, Japan made the right call. At least they'll be able to compete at all.

In Japan, as of July 8, just 28.51% of the population had received at least one dose of a COVID-19 vaccine. That's slightly higher than the world average (24.99%), but much lower than the countries hosting last weekend's major sporting events — United Kingdom (67.32%), United States (54.79%) and Brazil (39.38%) — according to Our World in Data.

Pair lower vaccination numbers with the rise in COVID-19 cases in Tokyo and the emergence of the Delta variant in Japan and you have a perfect mixture for a spectator-less Games.

And as crazy as it sounds, an Olympics with no fans might have been better than the alternative.

Prior to the state of emergency declaration, the IOC had already decided to ban foreign fans from the Games, allowing a limited number of local fans (no more than 10,000 in a venue).

Here's the kicker, though: They wouldn't have been allowed to cheer. Vocally, anyway.

The original plan was for fans to have to make it through protocols — including temperature checks and face-covering requirements — to enter, but once inside, they wouldn't be allowed to drink alcohol, ask for autographs, hug one another or verbally cheer. They'd only be allowed to clap — and if they were caught breaking any of those rules, they'd be escorted out of the venue.

Sports inherently cause people to feel a wide range of emotions — happiness, sadness, rage and everything else along the spectrum. That becomes even truer when talking about international competition.

Clapping just doesn't do that level of passion justice.

So while it may be odd to see Simone Biles winning a boatload of medals in front of a plethora of empty seats, just remember that millions of people are sitting in their homes, thankful the Olympics are back and cheering her on with their faces pressed against the TV screen and their voices reaching certain decibels we only get to witness every four years.

And as long as you don't upset the neighbors, scream both expletives and words of support to your heart's content. I promise you won't be thrown out.

That's what the Summer Games is all about.

Some students and parents may already be familiar with Peele, who was the offensive coordinator for the school's football team this past season alongside head coach Sherman Howze. He's since stepped down from the OC job to give himself more time to focus on his new role.

While he's set to inherit an AD role rich with responsibilities — many of which won't arise until students return in the fall — one of his primary areas of focus remains to build relationships at the school and in the community, taking the time to get to know everyone involved in Bears athletics.

"What I'm really looking forward to is just building relationships with the community and with the faculty, staff, students, everyone at the high school," Peele said, "because I think that's a very important thing, to have a great relationship with people, with the community, so we can continue to have the community support that Chatham Central's had in the past and continue their athletic tradition."

The Bears' newest head man is no stranger to high school athletics. Far from it, in fact.

Peele accumulated a little over two decades worth of teaching and coaching experience in a wide variety of sports: baseball, cross country, football, golf and track & field. That includes a 14-year stint coaching football, as an assistant, at Lee County High School in Sanford from 2005 to 2019.

His experience in so many areas not only means he has plenty of skills to show off at a family reunion or company picnic, but also that he understands how to best lend his support to all of the sports teams under Chatham Central's umbrella.

"(Stepping down as the football team's OC) will give me the opportunity to be able to contribute more time to these other teams," Peele said, "just making sure they are taken care of so that they can operate successfully and go on to have great seasons in their respective sports."

Though he's only spent a little less than two weeks on the job, Peele has already begun thinking of ideas he'd like to bring to Bear Creek in an effort to boost both the athletic program's brand and atmosphere at home games.

Peele mentioned creating an Instagram page for Chatham Central athletics to promote the school's teams and inform students and community members when the Bears have upcoming games.

He also wants to create a dedicated student section — equipped with a catchy name and all — at some of the school's sports venues to give students a chance to "congregate together and cheer on their classmates."

But first, he wants to make sure he learns the basic ins and outs of the job before implementing anything new.

And his predecessor, Pegram, is making sure the transition goes swimmingly.

"He's been a great asset for me," Peele said. "I spent a lot of time in June, once I accepted the position, coming over to Central while he was still finishing up and he was very helpful in giving me ideas, giving me contact information, giving me training on all of these programs. ... He said anytime I needed him to give him a call. I've probably averaged calling him at least once a day."

LITTLE LEAGUE BASEBALL

Baseball is back: Chatham's Little League All-Stars find success in district, state tournaments

BY VICTOR HENSLEY
News + Record Staff

Submitted photo

The view of Southern Bank Stadium with East Chatham's Christian Batcheller (at plate) up to bat during his team's 3-0 win over Wilson in the All-Stars' opening game of the N.C. Little League 8U state tournament last Friday.

On a toasty evening last Friday, East Chatham took the field at Southern Bank Stadium — a replica of Wilson's historic Fleming Stadium, which opened in 1939 — in an atmosphere unlike any it'd experienced up to that point for its first game of the tournament against the hometown Wilson team.

Southern Bank Stadium, constructed as part of the J. Burt Gillette Baseball Complex in 2009, is equipped with a grandstand that seats 450 spectators, a large lawn that can fit around 500 more and a scoreboard in the outfield that displays an image of the batter when they're at the plate. It may not have been Williamsport, but it sure felt like it.

East Chatham came prepared for the bright lights.

"It's funny because our outfielders, since that big Jumbotron's up there, they're just staring at it while the pitch is in play and I'm like, '...Please look at the field!'" Lewis said with a laugh. "It was great, it was loud. The stadium was echoing, the music was blaring. ... They seemed to rise to the level as opposed to shrinking from the moment."

The EC All-Stars went on to defeat Wilson, 3-0, on its home turf in a dominant showing.

But they hadn't yet hit their stride. The following day — on one of the complex's smaller fields — they shut out Rocky Mount, 10-0, meaning that through the tournament's first two games, East Chatham had yet to allow a single run. The train kept on rolling.

"They hit the ball well, our infield defense is our true strength — we have some phenomenal infielders — but maybe more than anything was that they had this unflappable nature, they just never got down," Lewis said. "Young players, it's an emotional game for them. ... They were just big-time hungry competitors and played with passion and I'd hesitate to call it 'malice,' but they really wanted to beat the other team."

The EC All-Stars lost to Franklin later on Saturday afternoon, 9-8, but would get their revenge in the single-elimination portion of the tournament on Sunday, downing Franklin in the rematch, 11-8, and advancing to the state semifinals.

Then, they ran into a team that Lewis describes as a "buzzsaw."

East Chatham's season ended in the semifinals on Sunday with a 10-0 shut-out loss to Lake Norman, the tournament's no. 1 seed.

"They were noticeably better than us," Lewis said, referring to Lake Norman. "Even though we had lost to Franklin, it didn't feel like they were better than us, but Lake Norman felt better than us."

While the EC All-Stars never got a chance to play for a championship on the same field that hosted their opening win, a third-place finish in the state's 8U division is no reason to scoff.

Lewis says he doesn't think so, either, but he's ready to find a way to get over that hump.

The off-season starts now.

"To me, the season was a great success," Lewis said. "The kids grew, they've gotten a bunch of new buddies. ... I'd say, 30,000-foot view, I'm super proud and impressed and it's just been a phenomenal season. But on the micro-level, I'm turning over every rock to try to figure out how we can win that last game. I think that's my job as a coach and my job as a board member, to give these boys every chance to succeed."

Making the county proud

This season, Little League teams from both East and West Chatham have spent countless hours practicing for district and state tournaments, learned plenty of life lessons both on and off the field and — most importantly — had tons of fun in the process.

After losing last season to the COVID-19 pandemic, baseball in the county has come back in full force.

The All-Stars from the East Chatham Little League had two teams representing the county at the state tournament, including the 8U team that finished third place in Wilson and the 14U team that finished as the state runner-up in Kernersville, both of which won their respective district tournaments.

The 10U (fourth place) and 12U (third place) teams fell just short of qualifying for their state tournaments after their district tournament performances.

However, the West Chatham All-Stars boasts one of the county's most impressive teams as the 12U squad won its district tournament last month, posting a 5-0 record by a combined score of 58-1. They'll begin play in the state tournament in Eden this Saturday, July 17, for a shot at a championship.

West Chatham also saw its 8U and 10U teams qualify for the state tournament after winning their district tournaments.

The 8U squad lost in the state tournament two weekends ago and the 10U team lost in the single-elimination portion of its tournament on Monday.

In total, five of the county's eight All-Stars teams were crowned district champions in June.

As great as the final scores, trophies and banners are, this summer has illustrated the importance of Little League baseball as a whole.

"It's scary sometimes to put yourself out there because what if you fail, but if you want to chase greatness, there could be pain on the other side but otherwise there's just mediocrity," Lewis said. "The kids showed talent, they showed that they wanted it, so why not pour everything into it? Why not show them what's attainable with hard work?"

HILL

for an hour and then go hiking to someone who couldn't get off the couch. It was ridiculous."

His wife Rachel said that between the pain, the anemia and going off original cancer medication led to "a serious nosedive" for Corbie.

"He was so exhausted all he could do was lie down, and even breathing was labored," she said.

Hill's oncology team at UNC Hospitals, the group which nursed him back from an initial diagnosis of chronic lymphocytic leukemia (CLL) in 2017, began to methodically look at the possible explanations for his increasing lack of energy. It was an attempt to rule out everything that didn't mean a return of his cancer.

"They knew something was wrong, something was weird," he said.

By April, as the promise of summer approached and the world began to think of life after a pandemic, Hill learned what he had suspected all along: the leukemia was active in his marrow again.

"I wasn't surprised," he said, "when I found out that was what was causing it."

Hill's CLL diagnosis infers in its name that it's chronic — "chronic is in its nature," he says. Remission isn't something that's a part of the equation for CLL sufferers; rather, it's a matter of using drug treatments to reduce the leukemia to low or undetectable levels.

"I mean, it's always in there, it's always in my bloodstream, you know, or, I guess also in my bone marrow," he said. "So it's just a question of level — not a question of it ever really going away."

In his May Facebook post, Hill wrote that back in 2017, the leukemia "never hurt."

The 2021 diagnosis was different.

"There was a lot of pain, and my exhaustion (leukemia's calling card) was insurmountable, severe," he wrote. "I learned new definitions of patience. The muscles I'd built through years of working out wasted away to nothing. I became weak, exhausted, useless."

Which was incredibly frightening for someone who had transformed his body after that first go-round with leukemia.

Becoming a runner

Hill, who had the lean build of a serious runner before he became one, works as a staff writer for Duke Magazine, the official alumni magazine of Duke University. He's well known around Pittsboro, where he lives, for his writing skills — he worked as a freelancer for years before getting the Duke gig — and for gigs of another kind: as a songwriter and guitarist and vocalist, performing in local bands and working as a music producer.

But as a runner, a racer? It's not something Hill had done as an adult.

You'd more likely find him talking about his passion for "Star Trek" or one of the more than 100 bands which show up under his Facebook page's "artists" section, or kayaking on Jordan Lake with his wife and their two daughters.

But after that cancer diagnosis four years ago, things changed.

It's hard to imagine a cancer diagnosis as a blessing. But it's always life-changing. As he came back from his 2017 diagnosis and began his medical treatment, Hill started hitting the gym — something he'd never done before. As 2018 approached, he became a regular at the YMCA in Pittsboro. His increased energy seemed to feed his workouts; his workouts — "I just tried out the free weights and stumbled my way through it" — helped increase his energy. That boost made his occasional canoeing trips with family (Rachel joined him at the Y) and friends more fun. He added kayaking to his menu of activities and his energy level increased even more.

Then Hill gave running a try — hopping on a treadmill one day purely out of curiosity.

"And I was like, this is actually fun," he said.

Within a few months he was running outdoors.

"And," he said, "I got hooked."

Hill eventually entered his first 5K race, setting a goal to run the course in 24 minutes or less. His time was closer to 23 minutes than 24.

"I thought I was just going out there and running," he said. "I didn't realize that I'd gotten to a point where I could move really fast. And I'm thinking, 'Well, let's see how far this goes. You know, why not be good at this?'"

He kept at it through 2019 and 2020; not even the COVID-19 pandemic could slow him down. Even though there were no more in-person races, Hill took part in "virtual" events and kept up his regimen, adding intervals — repeated short but high-intensity runs with small rest breaks in between — to his weekly running calendar. All that work led to his three sub-21 minute 5Ks in December, reaching a goal he'd set for himself — before his leukemia made its reappearance.

No stranger to cancer

It's a gross understatement to say that Hill is no stranger to cancer. Eleven months to the day after his initial 2017 diagnosis, his wife learned she had breast cancer. Because of the prevalence of breast cancer in her family, Rachel, at age 35, decided to opt for a double mastectomy. After a successful surgery, her treatments now consist of hormone therapy.

"It has been kind of surreal as you might imagine," she said. "We were diagnosed with cancer within about a year of each other, which is a little ridiculous. I have a strong family history of breast cancer so I think it was a little less of a shock. Despite going to the same hospital our treatments/experiences have felt more different than similar, with Corbie's being more of a steady, long term need."

She's healthy, but for the couple's daughters — Sarah, 11, and Lucy, 9 — seeing their mother and father each battle a life-threatening disease is something even Hill struggles to process.

"It's been such a part of their young life so far that I can't really tell you how they're handling it, because they just seem like themselves," Hill said.

Rachel said that even though "kids can be pretty resilient," she knows they worry.

"We also have lots of offers of help and support from family and friends, which is invaluable," she said.

Hill said Sarah plays piano and has a deep appreciation for classic country music.

"She's all about Dolly

Parton, Emmylou Harris and Loretta Lynn," he said. "She understands at her young age that this is 'hard times' music, and hard times music makes a lot of sense. I think after several years of this" — seeing her parents go through the cancer journey — "I think she really understands: Yeah, life's hard. You do talk about the hard stuff, but you find the light in it, too. I think she appreciates it on that level, and gets it, and uses that music as part of her worldview because she knows that from her experiences."

Just like Hill has done himself.

Back in May, in his announcement about his diagnosis, in the midst of the extreme pain and anemia, he was intensely reflective about his future.

"I'm ready to get back on my feet," Hill wrote in the May 12 Facebook post. "I'm ready to hike and kayak and run and lift weights and cook and play music and do the things that make me feel like a complete person. I know none of that will happen in a hurry, but I'm confident it's coming back. At this point, I'll settle for having the energy to stay awake all day ... Baby steps. Baby steps."

He wrote that he wasn't as "bold and glowing and fearless" as he was in 2017.

"Now I feel like I'm keeping my footing in a hurricane," he wrote. "Now I feel like disaster is the nature of the universe and the best I can do is scurry from foxhole to foxhole."

But Hill also wrote that despite the cancer that had so relentlessly attacked him and his wife, he sincerely believed he was living his best life.

"I'm married to someone who gets me like no one else ever has or will," his post read. "Somehow in this enormous, chaotic world I found my match, and we hold each other up no matter what gets thrown at us. I have my dream job. My kids are great kids. I play music with talented, creative people and live in a town where I fit, where I make sense. I never expected any of these things.

"I think about quantum realities sometimes, and if there are parallel universes, in most of them I'm dead already. My body turned on itself by 35, and without advanced medicine my leukemia comes flooding back, inexorable as the sea and just as lethal. As sh*tty a time as I've had this spring, I live in one of the good universes. I'm alive. I'm with Rachel. There's a fighting chance that I'll stick around. That's enough. It has to be."

Since then, the new treatment his oncologist prescribed for this latest bout with CLL has done its work. Doctors suspect the medication which did so well beginning in 2017 stopped being effective, possibly because of a mutation with his leukemia. "You know, it was working," Hill said, "but not enough."

A switch in medications — he takes pills; CLL doesn't respond to chemotherapy — and some blood transfusions helped him feel better almost immediately after his spring diagnosis. It made Hill feel strong enough to take two camping trips in June and even embark on some hikes.

It was difficult for him physically, but also a relief.

"I think it was about a week or so before I felt kind of normal," he said. "I was coming back from much more severe anemia than last time. This time, I just couldn't stay awake. When I was really in the throes of this thing, it sucked because I was so sick and felt so bad that I couldn't stay awake. But then when I fell asleep, I couldn't stay asleep. It was awful."

The CLL indicators are all falling now.

"We're in a positive place," Hill said.

The long-term outlook? His doctors hope this treatment protocol will last 10 years. And there are backup therapies in place, too, and research into new therapies as well. CLL is rare for someone of his age — it usually strikes an older population — but his oncology team is hopeful and realistic about keeping Hill alive for another 40 years or more.

In the meantime, Hill is running again. His 5K times are hovering around the 25-minute mark, but that's perfectly fine.

He's been there before. He knows now he has the time to work on his speed.

In the lyrics from "Survivor Song," which Hill wrote and recorded in 2019 with his band Land Is, he paints another hopeful note.

"Room by room we all face a different beast," the song's last verse reads.

"When we come to the table that cancer sets, That mindless thief of time, That horrible weight on my mind ...

"That rotten chord I won't let spoil, My survivor song."

CCPHD distributes potassium iodide to residents near power plant

PITTSBORO — The Chatham County Public Health Department recently distributed potassium iodide (KI) to residents and employers within 10 miles of the Shearon Harris Nuclear Power Plant.

KI is a type of salt that is often added to table salt. It is also a non-prescription medication designed to protect the thyroid during a nuclear power plant emergency involving the release of radioactive iodine. If taken within the appropriate time period and at the appropriate dosage, it can reduce the risk of thyroid cancer and other thyroid disorders by blocking the thyroid gland's intake of radioactive iodine.

Since 2003, the State of North Carolina has required local health departments to distribute KI doses every five years to all residents and employers within 10 miles of a nuclear power plant, otherwise known as the Emergency Planning Zone (EPZ). These doses are free of charge and should only be taken if instructed by officials during an emergency event at the nuclear power plant involving the release of radioactive iodine.

"While this action follows a state mandate, it also falls right in line with our mission as a public health department and is part of our ongoing public health emergency preparedness efforts," said Anne Lowry, Chatham County Environmental Health Director. "In the rare case of a nuclear power plant emergency, KI can provide critical protection for the thyroid."

The kits assembled by Chatham County Public Health Department staff include one dose for up to two adults and a "Frequently Asked Questions" fact sheet about KI, including why, when and how to take it. The doses expire in 2029. If you live in the EPZ and have not received the KI by July 14th, you can pick it up at the Chatham County Public Health Department's Environmental Health desk, at 80 East St., Pittsboro.

Fireworks — fun and philanthropic

Everyone's seen the fireworks tents that pop up in the week before July 4, but what happens to the take-home-combustibles business in the other 51 weeks of the year?

D. LARS DOLDER
Enterprising Chatham

president and CEO of Duffey Communications, told me.

Simmons' company represents TNT Fireworks, the unequivocal industry leader. The company has been in business for more than 100 years and distributes fireworks and sparklers to 49 states. It's the nation's largest fireworks distributor with products sold in more than 40,000 retail stores, Simmons said, but TNT's most common incarnation is the pop-up tent that seems to populate every parking lot across the country in July and December, before inconspicuously disappearing as festivities subside. The tents don't contribute much to TNT's bottom line, though.

"TNT partners with nonprofit groups nationwide, raising more than $30 million each year for their respective causes," Simmons said. "The proceeds derived from fireworks sales each year directly support local initiatives ranging from well-established charitable organizations and local public-school groups raising funds for band and sports equipment to youth groups raising funds for mission trips."

Duffey couldn't release specifics of TNT's Chatham partners, nor how much revenue they make on average, citing the company's policy not to make sales figures public. And it would be "too early to estimate at this point," anyway, she said. But this year and last, fireworks sales were off the chart. According to some reports, individual tents could make more than $20,000 in a week's time.

"Product demand was extremely high in 2020 due to the pandemic," Simmons said. "Since the majority of professional fireworks displays were canceled due to COVID-19, families celebrated at home with consumer fireworks. Product demand was also high this year because families and friends were excited about being able to celebrate together."

Unsurprisingly — as with lumber, microchips, used cars, oil and more that I've previously written about — the fireworks ran out.

"There is a national shortage of consumer products this year," Simmons said, "including fireworks, due to shipping delays, container shortages and back-up at ports, so many consumers were shopping early."

Fortunately, fireworks rarely come with expiration dates. Any reserve you've managed to stockpile ought to last until your next jamboree. But don't go too crazy. North Carolina law forbids the most spectacular fireworks displays except by special permitting. To play it safe stick with sparklers, fountains, smoke devices, snake and glow worms, trick noisemakers, string poppers or snappers and toy pistol caps. Explosives or aerial fireworks, roman candles, rockets and similar devices are expressly prohibited.

Other business news

Back in May I wrote about a concept home in Chatham Park designed to address feedback from about 7,000 Americans nationwide (Millennials start settling down, but (as always) it's on their own terms). The house, now officially dubbed Barnaby, was unveiled Tuesday after a 60-day, foundation-to-finish build.

"As you previously covered the results from the study, you'll have a good idea about the types of layout and design shifts made in the home," Wendy Agudelo, a senior communications strategist for the project, told me. "But words on paper hardly do the design justice."

Barnaby is a 2,600 square-foot, two-story, four bedroom, three-and-a-half-bath concept home constructed to satisfy Americans' (read: millennials') newfound needs after enduring nearly 15 months in pandemic. The data from the completed survey — called the America At Home Study — revealed major paradigm shifts in ideology, which researchers think will fundamentally shift the homebuilding market in years to come.

"Millennials have always made their own way, and they're continuing to do that now as more of them enter the housing market," Alaina Money-Garman, CEO and co-founder of Cary-based Garman Homes, previously told the News + Record. "They don't want the same things as their parents did."

Garman partnered with the America At Home Study leaders to develop the Barnaby concept. Their design considerations prioritized safety, comfort and wellness. Dedicated office space, "flex spaces," a guest suite with outdoor access, larger family bathroom, multiple covered outdoor spaces, improved kitchen functionality, flexible storage, drop zones for package deliveries and touchless fixtures were all features heavily requested in the national survey. And my favorite feature: The master bedroom includes a breakaway bookcase that hides a secret chamber.

Barnaby was open this week for exclusive, invite-only tours on Tuesday and Wednesday. Digital and remote walk-throughs were also available. The house is located at 28 Edgefield St. in Pittsboro at the intersection of Vine Parkway and Edgefield. To learn more about the project, visit concepthome.garmanhomes.com/#/.

CCS extends deadline for next year's standalone virtual academy

BY HANNAH MCCLELLAN
News + Record Staff

Chatham County Schools has extended its deadline for K-8 applications to its standalone virtual academy for next year, and will now accept students through July 30.

The deadline for high schoolers was June 15. At the end of June, about 155 students signed up for the standalone academy, CCC's Amanda Hartness told the News + Record. Now, that number is still hovering around 150 students, she said.

Last year, more than 2,000 CCS students — about 25% of the system's enrollment — opted into Virtual Academy, a remote-only option mandated by the state to allow students to continue learning online even as schools resumed in-person learning. Though not required by the state this year, Hartness said offering a learning option all families feel comfortable with is important.

"As we think about services post pandemic, we have to think about the opportunities we provide for students and families," said Hartness, who is the district's assistant superintendent of academic services and instructional support. "We want our students and families to have as many options as possible."

The academy will require a semester-long commitment and will not provide a paper packet option for students like it did last year, claiming its "almost impossible to provide quality instruction" through them. (To sign up or learn more about the program, visit: https://docs.google.com/forms/d/e/1FAIpQLS-dQUH_hJXJeJ-896P6AZf2Xszj4pFwpHp-pjVM3dv-Vz3ttmDw/viewform)

CCS is using part of its COVID-19 relief funds to fund the standalone virtual academy K-12 program, paying for district-wide virtual academy positions: six teachers, two instructional assistants and one enhancement staffer. Previously, the district said teachers and staff teaching students in-person and those opting to learn virtually was a big source of burnout last year.

The standalone academy will be housed at two schools: K-8 at Bennett School and high school at Chatham Central, which has had a virtual academy for the last four years. Teachers will be hired for the virtual classes, but the principal at Bennett will oversee the program.

"It'll be different in that different schools aren't having to piece this together, I'll have a staff specifically dedicated to the Virtual Academy," said Bennett Principal Carla Neal. "So I'm in the process right now of hiring teachers. We have a great new virtual curriculum coach that I'm really excited about, and will operate this kind of as two schools within a school, but as a separate entity, so we can give all of our energy and attention to virtual learning. I'm really excited about that part."

Last year, there were mixed feelings among families regarding asynchronous learning — learning done on your own time, rather than at a set time. Some families liked the option, saying it provided more flexibility for students, while others thought the lack of structure was harmful to learning.

Next year's virtual academy will have synchronous and asynchronous components, Neal said, with about two hours every school day set aside for direct instruction with teachers.

"It wouldn't be fair to say that your kid's going to be logged onto a computer for five hours, nor would that be best for students," she said. "That's not age appropriate. That's just not good learning. It's not good for your health."

While some families indicated interest in the virtual academy due to remaining COVID-19 concerns, Neal said most were interested due to the flexibility provided to students. Research has also shown that some students — particularly LGBTQ students and students of color — virtual learning offered reprieve from school environments that often felt stressful or unsafe.

About 20% of families expressed interest in a virtual-only option in a district survey last semester; fewer students ended up signing up. At this time, Hartness said the program is definitely worth having, though moving forward, she said the district will have to think about "the fiscal viability of the program," using online services if student registration numbers don't warrant a full staff.

Karla Eanes, principal at Chatham Central, said the virtual academy there was originally started as a partnership with homeschool groups and has since expanded to students looking to take online courses. The academy is an opportunity to partner with the wider community, she said.

"We saw this as a need before COVID even hit. ... The fact that we saw that need early in the game, I think those reasons are still very valid and real reasons," Eanes said. "I think COVID taught us that there are some students who actually, contrary to popular belief, really thrived in this environment. I think that students have learned I don't need to sit in a building every day, all day long for six, seven hours to learn. And I think this honors that."

CDC's guidance says schools should fully reopen, masks optional for the fully vaccinated

BY HANNAH MCCLELLAN
News + Record Staff

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention urged schools on Friday to fully reopen in the fall, also saying that fully vaccinated students and teachers don't have to wear face masks in school.

While the CDC also emphasized a return to in-person school last spring, this most updated guidance is the first with language explicitly stating the importance of offering in-person learning, even if all prevention strategies cannot be implemented at a school.

"For example, because of the importance of in-person learning," the updated guidance says, "schools where not everyone is fully vaccinated should implement physical distancing to the extent possible within their structures (in addition to masking and other prevention strategies), but should not exclude students from in-person learning to keep a minimum distance requirement."

The guidance also encouraged vaccine promotion as "the leading public health prevention strategy to end the COVID-19 pandemic" and clarified that anyone not fully vaccinated should wear a mask indoors. In addition, the agency said screening testing, ventilation, handwashing, staying home when sick and cleaning and disinfection are also "important layers of prevention" at schools.

"COVID-19 prevention strategies remain critical to protect people, including students, teachers, and staff, who are not fully vaccinated, especially in areas of moderate-to-high community transmission levels," the guidance says.

CDC also said local health departments and governments should monitor community transmission, vaccination coverage, screening testing and occurrence of outbreaks to make decisions on the level of "layered prevention strategies" such as physical distancing and screening testing. The guidance did not offer a roadmap for situations in which a school should not fully reopen.

In Chatham, most students had the option of returning to some form of in-person learning by mid-spring. At Chatham County Schools, students had the option to return to four days of in-person learning under Plan A starting in April, following new legislation requiring daily in-person learning for elementary students and allowing it for middle and high schoolers.

Under that plan, a mid-week planning/cleaning day was still allowed; CCS administration stressed how important that planning day was for staff teaching multiple groups of students (remote, hybrid). Next year, CCS will offer a standalone virtual academy, meaning students opting for online-only courses will be taught by teachers designated to that program.

While nothing official has been announced by Gov. Roy Cooper or the CCS Board of Education regarding plans for next fall, both state and local officials have long pointed to the hope of returning to five days of "normal" in-person learning next year. Cooper said on Tuesday, at a vaccination stop in a Cabarrus County high school, he expects to issue a new recommendation for mask-wearing in schools soon, the Raleigh News & Observer reported.

"I want our schools to go back in the fall as normal as possible," Cooper said.

At CCS, this year's summer programming is offered completely in person.

For many students and teachers, remote learning was full of challenges, and the return to any form of in-person learning is welcomed. Still, the new guidance is concerning to some community members, particularly as the World Health Organization still recommends universal masking in indoor public spaces and as the Delta variant spreads. Additionally, emerging research suggests that vaccines might not be as effective for people who are immunocompromised — calling into question how such students and teachers will be protected at schools loosening masking mandates, even if they are fully vaccinated.

In North Carolina, Gov. Cooper previously cited the CDC's old mask guidance for schools as reason to continue face covering requirements in schools, even as he lifted them in most other places.

North Carolina legislators could soon pass a law that would allow K-12 schools to make face masks optional. The "Free the Smiles Act" was approved by the state House but was rejected in the Senate, but lawmakers are working toward a potential compromise bill.

Two N.C. school districts — Harnett and Rowan-Salisbury — have already defied Cooper's current face mask mandate for schools, the N&O's T. Keung Hui reported in a Twitter thread Tuesday.

"It's masks today & vaccinations today. What's it tomorrow?" Hui tweeted, quoting Rowan-Salisbury board member Travis Allen on opting to make face masks optional. "If they can make your child wear a mask at school, or a teacher wear a mask & dictate they can't have a public education unless they do, I think they can attempt anything."

While the CDC guidance does stress masking for individuals not fully vaccinated, some people have expressed concern over how that will be controlled, particularly with so many politicized views surrounding the importance of mask-wearing — despite research from the CDC, WHO and epidemiologists alike emphasizing the important role masks play in preventing spread among the unvaccinated.

In North Carolina, 54% of the state's 12-17 year olds and 56% of all adults have received at least one COVID-19 vaccine dose, according to the state's vaccination dashboard as of Tuesday morning. It's not yet clear if students 12 and younger will have the option to be vaccinated by the fall.

CHATHAM CHAT | 'CREEK WEEK' AT ROCKY RIVER

Foundation's volunteers conduct clean-up effort

Environmental and volunteer organizations routinely devote hundreds of hours every month to keep lakes and rivers in North Carolina as pristine as possible. This week, we speak with Pamela Hawe, a member of the Rocky River Heritage Foundation; foundation members and other river organizations recently completed Chatham's first "Creek Week" program, working to clean a portion of the Rocky River. Hawe serves as vice president of the foundation and has been affiliated with the group since 2008. She and RRFH President Phillip Cox work with the state of North Carolina and other groups to coordinate Creek Week.

expert guidance — to get into the water and observe the wildlife first hand. Brena Jones from the N.C. Wildlife Resources Commission thrilled a group of enthusiasts by finding the ever-elusive Notropis mekistocholas, better known as the Cape Fear Shiner. She explained the work that is going into the protection and recovery of this endangered fish. A variety of other native fish were netted and observed, but the highlight was an unusually marked leech specimen, complete with babies!

And Matt Jones with the N.C. State Co-op Extension gave an informative Zoom lecture to a very interested audience about the best plant life to use for the local rivers.

Was this the "first" Creek Week in Chatham County?

Yes, for both Chatham County and Lee County. There has been opportunity in the past for us to participate in the statewide event, but this has been the first time it has been attempted for both. Since we share the Deep River, it seemed like a good chance to do something together. That is why we are proud for the interest and great ideas offered. Next year it will be bigger, hopefully including more sites and rivers. We have plans to go through the lessons learned and expand on this year's wonderful events.

What was the focus of the week?

Creek Week took place in Chatham and Lee counties from June 19-26, allowing residents to explore the natural resources of our local rivers and creeks. The celebration included daily river-oriented activities for public participation.

Starting on June 19, several events kicked off the week. RRFH volunteers conducted a clean-up project along the upper Rocky River, which yielded 12 bags of garbage, tires, refrigerator, and a prayer. The Deep River Park Association also did a clean-up on the Deep River at Camelback Bridge, filling several bags of trash removed from the banks. Afterwards, volunteers were treated to bluegrass music by the Hill Boys while munching on well-earned hot-dogs.

In addition to cleaning the river areas, there was opportunity — under

When the work was done, did the volunteers get a chance to learn more about the river and the area?

Yes. Many participants came for the stories. Several events gave insight into the history of the Deep River, as told by our local and gifted story tellers. Starting after the clean-up Mike Parker entertained with one about a favorite cryptid here in Chatham County, Bigfoot. Cole Wicker, a Duke graduate student researching Central North Carolina's coal mining heritage, shared his family history in the Cumnock settlement. Finally, Jimmy Haire, who knows all there is to know about Sanford and Lee County history, kept the audience spell-bound with tales from around the county.

There was even a chance for individuals to creatively express the river's beauty. Aspiring artists were coached on how to capture the water lily adornments in a masterpiece of acrylic painting by retired art teacher Donna Strickland.

Lastly, for the adventurous, paddling opportunities were offered on the Rocky and Deep. Those wanting a closer look at the rivers and wildlife were provided capable equipment and instruction by the RRFH, Cape Fear River Adventures and Endor Paddle groups. There was a good response to this function indicating residents want to see, and be, more connected to our natural resources.

All in all, more than 130 people participated in the celebration of Chatham

Pet of the Week: MAISIE

The Chatham County Sheriff's Office would like you to meet Maisie, a 6-month-old, female, black and white Labrador-Retriever mix. Given a choice between running in the yard or curling up next to a loving human, Maisie will choose your company every time! She is a lovable, darling dog with a calm, quiet demeanor and loyal personality. A very good doggo, indeed! When Maisie is in a spirited mood, she is most excited to playfully tussle with her person or roll around in the grass as opposed to chewing tennis balls or playing tug-o-war. If you or your family is in search of a dedicated companion who will never leave your side or stop adoring you, Maisie is the sweetheart for you! For more information about how to meet or adopt Maisie or another pet, please contact the Sheriff's Office Animal Resource Center at 919-542-7203 to schedule an appointment for a visit at 725 Renaissance Dr., Pittsboro.

Pet of the Week: CHIPMUNK

The Chatham County Sheriff's Office would like you to meet Chipmunk, a spayed female who is approximately ten months old and as cute as can be! She earned her name for her chubby cheeks and squeaky meows and quickly solidified herself as a staff favorite at the Animal Resource Center (ARC). Chipmunk loves attention and even enjoys being held and cuddled by humans! Her favorite spot is snuggled into the cozy base of your neck where she can purr enthusiastically and nuzzle you with her nose. If you are sitting on a couch or recliner, she will likely curl up on your lap or claim a perch on your shoulder where she can "knead biscuits" on your achy trapezius muscles. If working from home has you feeling bored or stiff, Chipmunk will make an ideal roommate/companion! Chipmunk's adoption fee is only $20 and covers her spay, microchipping, vaccines and more! For more information about how to meet or adopt Chipmunk or another pet, please contact the Sheriff's Office Animal Resource Center (ARC) at 919-542-7203 to schedule an appointment for a visit at 725 Renaissance Dr., Pittsboro.
